THE EBONY BOX.

[FROM STRANGE STORIES OF A DETECTIVE.]
(Concluded.)

At this point of his narrative Captain Bill introduced an anecdotal sketch of the formation of the same character, in which his companion, Black Jack, was him at a critical moment, and made off with the booty. This experience made him distrustful, and he did not quit his hold upon the case, notwithstanding the weight, which distressed him exceedingly. While they were resting and consulting together in darkness and security, they heard the cry of an infant, and concluded that the party who had been in the neighborhood was probably unattended, and many robberies had been committed there with impunity in open day. Black Jack proposed that they should strike the right with a burglarious expedition to the room above, leaving the casket, meanwhile, in the basement. Captain Bill was averse to the proposition, but finally yielded, with the understanding that he was to continue his grasp upon the handle of the casket.

This being understood, as a measure of safety in case they were obliged to make a sudden exit, they took off their shoes, came up the kitchen stairs, opened and left the front door ajar; ascended to the third story, and finding all quiet, peered through the keyhole of the room, where they saw an asleep with a book before her, and a candle burning by the bedside.

Then followed a succession of sob, groans, and 'Oh my!' The old lady appeared to be in despair of bringing her obdurate son to a sense of his wickedness. When she had recovered breath, she changed her tone, and seemed to beguile cheerful. John had said something conciliatory which I did not hear.

'Ah!' said the old lady, 'never call me by that odious name again. And so it appears that this fool, Liston and his silly woman, are to be the cause of my ruin. I thought as much. But is Bill sure of getting this money? Liston may be a sharp, you know, for all he looks so stupid and stupid.' The language of Mrs. Marston and her son gradually changed into a flash of anger. I heard enough to satisfy me that the respectable old lady and her son were people of the vilest character, and had formerly been, if they were not still, in association with the common thieves of the city. John Marston, the printer, was evidently a burglar, and identical with Black Jack.

I felt no anxiety for the personal safety of myself and family, notwithstanding the proximity of Mrs. Marston and her son. I took it for granted that on the morrow the tasteful old woman would betray her knowledge of the secret to my wife, and I was not disappointed. When I came home to dinner from the shop, Alice informed me that Mrs. Marston had entertained her with a prolix account of the first years of her sea life, and that she had been in the East Indies; that she had heard nothing of him since she was a child, and that she was afraid he might be dead; that he ran away to sea during the life of her revered husband, the Rev. Dr. Marston, and had a daughter, the name of Livingston, which she thought was a disgrace to the name of Marston was a name much more respectable than Livingston.

Not daring to let Alice into the knowledge of Mrs. Marston's real character, I told her to hear all that the old lady might say, and report it to me. The next day Mrs. Marston showed several letters, purporting to be written by her son in the first years of his sea life, and which she had before Alice, and called her to write the letters to show me, as she began to believe that the Livingston might be in fact the owner of the treasure. The letters were of various dates, at Batavia, Amsterdam, and London, and were all written in a hand which she had never seen before. She produced one after another, and called her attention to the quality, texture, and the maker's stamp. She immediately having a quick memory and observation, identified one of these sheets as the same in quality and make with the paper used in the pretended recovery of the treasure. I had then before me a letter, which she said she had written to her son, and which she had never seen before. She immediately having a quick memory and observation, identified one of these sheets as the same in quality and make with the paper used in the pretended recovery of the treasure.

I had then before me a letter, which she said she had written to her son, and which she had never seen before. She produced one after another, and called her attention to the quality, texture, and the maker's stamp. She immediately having a quick memory and observation, identified one of these sheets as the same in quality and make with the paper used in the pretended recovery of the treasure.
