The Foster Brother;

The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Thus the truth was brought to light, and justice was done at last. For well night twenty years the fraud had prospered, and the orphan of the wreck had been deprived of his inheritance. So long had the injusticy prevailed that the doers of the wrong had come to the belief that detection would never take place, that they should be allowed to enjoywith impanity the fruit of their unrighteous denies, but had a had come to the belief that detection would never take place, that they should be allowed to enjoywith impanity the fruit of their unrighteous denies, bet, in an hour when they thought not, their palace of fraud had crumbled, into ruins. At the moment when they had filled up the measure of their iniquity by the foulest crime which man cun commit, and when they were about to defile the altar, and coneign an imposent and helptess maiden to life-long inisery—all in the furtherance of their self-sh purposes—the vell of concealment which hitherto they had managed to keep around them was reat from the top to the botton, and they stood conseconely royealed in all their maked guiltness, with no rag of pretence to shelter under, and no crevice or shadow of subterfuge into which to crawl. The revelation of their fraudulence, their circumvention, and criminal deception was so clear that they made no attempt at denial, and songht not to modify their footion by fighting against the claims of the youth to the name and the property of George Morrár. Had nothing beyond civil liability being involved they would most certainly have taken every step the law allowed them to keep the Youth from his inheritance; but Stephen Gibson and Nathan Garrett knew full well that were a legal investigation to be opened, it would end only in entailing on them a heavy punishment. For this reason they accepted their defeat as hopiless, and tacitly admitted all that the revelation had made manifest.

And now the work of restitution and rectification had to follow. Here flarry was firm and stern, much more so than George was inclined to be. In t for the sake of Lilias and Harry, George would do nothing to publish the Captain's guilt.

Harry, however, would not suffer the matter to be settled so. He insisted on Nathan Garrett being banished from Ardgowan—yea, from Glenfask altogether The fraud, so far as he was concerned, could not be hilden, for the moment it was made known that George was the son of George Morrar, and that the lady who was drowned by the wreek was his wife, the imposition practised by Garrett and Rangoon became apparent. The public might be induced to suppose that Captain Gibson had been kept in ignorance of the truth till now; but Garretts guilt could not be screened, and Harry determined that his 'expulsion from the place should be taken as the infliction of his punishment—that he should be made yield up Mosage ve, and sent forth with so much of his ill-getten gains as would cany him and Rangoon to another land. Nathan Garrett was inclined very decidedly to denur to this. He wished and tried to make a much better bargain for himself, and believing that rather than incur family dishoner they would deal nore liberally with him, he showed some signs of being obstimate, and rested till Harry, with a stern inexorable mien, told him that rather than abate threse terms one jot he would bring down upon him the vengeance of the law at whatever cost. So Nathan Garrett, chagrined, mortified, and baffled, had to yield and depart.

A singular and painful event occurred in Christ Church, Savannah, on Christmas moraing. A girl about sixteen, Mississized Spencer, had just been confirmed, with several others, by Bishop Beck with. The ceremony was bardly over when she fell forward senseless. It was amprosed that she had fainted, but upon being carried from the church she gasped, as few times and diad. The fact was communicated to the congregation before its separation by the Bishop, who improved the opportunity to impress upon his years for the congregation before its force of the congregation of the portunity of the provided the opportunity to impress upon his years for the congregation as an att has just reached.
