The Times admits that Mr. Fielding has some justification for complaining that Canada's offer of preferential treatment for British goods has been treated by the mother country, as having little more than a sentimental interest. The great London journal agrees with him that the preference has had a substantial value and points out that in the past five years British exports have gained in the Canadian markets all they lost in the ten years before the preference. Speaking of the reprisals against Germany, the Times says that Canada has been patient and long-suffering in her methods.
