efforts to conceal it, that something had gone wrong with her, and rightly guessed Everet Mapleson had been the cause of it. He gently seated her, and then placed himself beside her, while Mr. Loring and his daughter returning at that moment, the party settled themselves very com-fortably for the remainder of the evening. pressy section the mander of the evening.

Everet devoted himself exclusively to Miss Loring, much to that. young lady's secret delight; her father gave his atten-

Gladys stole one little hand confidingly into his, under cover of her opera cloak. "Never mind, Geoff, now that I have you here; I will tell you some other time," she whispered, as she involuntarily turned her still flashing eyes toward young Mapleson, while a slight shiver ran

"Has be dared—" he began, sternly.
"Hush!" she returned; "it is all past;
he[will never dare again." She saw that Geoffrey needed but s word to make him demand an explanation of his rival, and she feared the worst from a meeting between them; so she resolved that she would not tell him what Everet had told her regarding his parentage, at least not until after their marriage, perhaps when they were on the ocean, where it would be impossible for him to take any aggressive measures until time had served to cool his anger, she might reveal what she had learned to him

So she tried to smile and appear inter ested in the opera, while every moment she wished it would end so that she might e released from that terrible constraint It was over at last, to her intense relief Evevet Mapleson escorted Miss Loring from the building, but when the party reached the sidewalk they found such a crowd before them that they were obliged to step back and wait for it to disperse

He has crossed my path too many times. I have never forgiven him on the old score, and I will never forgive him for being an interloper in my race."
