J. B. Sparrow's magnificent spectacular production of the historical producti ng language: "With respect to thing a prisoner there is no doubt a man when in custody may so ot himself, by reason of violence aguage or conduct, that a police may reasonably think it pru-and right to search him, in order quite wrong to suppose that any general rule can be applied to such a case. Even when a man is confined for being drunk and disorderly, it is not correct to say that he must submit to the degradation of being searched, as the searching of such a person must depend on all the circumstances of the case." This is practically what I told the jury in Gordon v. Stephen.

In the case, then, of persons in custody not accused of an indictable offence, it would appear that no general rule can be applied and that it would always be for a jury to say whether rule can be applied and that it would always be for a jury to say whether the case is one in which a search should have been made. In the very case tried by Vaughan Williams, J., the jury found for the defendant.

I am further reported to have said something which would reflect on the administration by the Police Commissioners of their office. Nothing was further from my intention. Counser for the plaintiff had argued that it was necessary to give exemplary damages to prevent other citizens from being treated as Gordon was. To prevent that argument having an undue effect on the minds of the jury, I told them that I did not suppose, in view of the expression of the law which the highest court in the Province had given on the question of searching, that any citizen in Gordon's position would ever be subjected to a like indignity.
