

inspired. Nor was this feeling not reciprocal on the part of the spectators. Many persons were moved even to tears, and gloom and sorrow overshadowed every countenance. All private pique, all personal animosity, all petty disappointment vanished at this moment. Throughout the immense mass of human beings assembled ran but one kind and general feeling of regret. Men gazed for the last time on the forms of those who had showered down blessings on poor,—on those who had lived among them so long, shedding the influence of pure and holy lives around them,—on those, in whom their bitterest political enemies could never raise an angry or revengeful passion. Men gazed: and many, whose utterance was choked by grief, breathed from the innermost core of their heart, an earnest and solemn prayer for the temporal and eternal welfare of the departing family.—Courier.

(From the Patriot.)

Sir John Colborne, Lady Colborne and family, left this morning at nine o'clock. They take with them the good wishes of all true British subjects. Sir John has the happy consciousness of having faithfully discharged his duty to his Sovereign, and of having witnessed the progressive improvement of the splendid region he has governed during the whole seven years of his mild and beneficent rule. High and low, rich and poor accompanied him several miles on his way, in a numerous and most respectable train of carriages,