THE CHARCOAL PIT GONE

Old Methods Are Replaced by Wood Distillation Process.
The charcoal pit which dotted the wooded spaces a generation ago, and which could be traced by the thin film of smoke that rose from the smouldering wood within, is now a thing of the past, says the New York Times.

There are two general methods of manufacturing charcoal—the charring of hardwood without making any attempt to save the escaping gases, either in earth-covered pits or brick kilns, and, second, as a product of the wood distillation industry. By this method wood is charred in ovens or retorts and the gases are collected in condensing chambers. This method is now being generally adopted because of the value, especially during war, of the chemicals obtained.

Wood charcoal, one of the purest forms of carbon, is of importance principally in the manufacture of charcoal iron, a high-grade iron, essential for certain types of castings. The production of charcoal for this purpose was formerly a distinct and important industry, but it has gradually been superseded in recent years by the expansion of the wood distillation industry, of which charcoal is but one of many products.

"RUGS WEAR LONGER"

"When you have hardwood floors."

"You forgot to mention that in your ad." So said the customer who called at our office.

There are many reasons why you should use hardwood floors, but not least is that they are the cheapest in the long run.

and important. The manufacture of black gun powder and blasting powder requires about 1,500,000 bushels annually. In making crucible steel it may be used to provide the necessary carbon, and a small amount is used as a dry color in paint manufacture. The porosity of wood charcoal gives it the power of absorbing certain gases. For this reason it is often employed as a disinfectant, and also has medicinal value. This property and its power to remove coloring matter from solutions make charcoal valuable as a filtering medium, since it removes objectionable color and odor from water.
