Miramichi Advance. CHATHAM, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1878.

The War. During the past week there has been quite a flutter of excitement over the news from Europe connected with the war. Hardly had the Turkish defenders been withdrawn from the outer lines of Constantinople, consequent upon the armistice, and news of the moving of the British fleet towards the Dardanelles been made known, than the despatches announced that the Russians were entering Constantinople and moving across to Gallipoli, that strategic point, where Great Britain threatened to effect a lodgement earlier in the war. Meantime a great debate was going on in the British House of Commons, caused by a request of the Government for a grant of six millions of pounds to meet any possible war contingency. Earl Carnarvon had resigned his seat in the Cabinet because it had held to and acted upon its policy of distrustting Russian's entire good faith in seeking only Turkish reform, and

Despatchesfrom Turkish sources showed that the powerful enemy of the Porte was taking bold steps to, at least, secure the fruits of victory, beyond contingency, and it looked as if the complete overthrow of Turkish rule and Turkish national status in Europe was aimed at, together with all that Russian acquisition of the Porte was aimed at, together with all that Russian acquisition of the Porte was aimed at, together with all that Russian acquisition of the Turkish ports would imply as affecting British interests.

The British Government requested an explanation from Russia and was assured that the first despatches overstated the meaning of the advance of the Russians towards Constantinople, while no advance on Gallipoli had taken place. Subsequent despatches show that Russia takes the ground that the partial and peaceable occurred.

I am very sorry to say that the revelations made before the Northern Railway and that the first despatches over stated the meaning of the advance of the Russians towards Constantinople, while no advance on Gallipoli had taken place. Mr. Mitchell, however, appears to think that any kind of statement is good enough for his constituents and that because he says a thing is so, it must be "swallow ed without tasting." The statements of the pampllet in question are got up in a way that savors of Tupperism and, indeed, the brochure is thought to be the joint effort of the chief disciples of Annains in the Tory ranks. Mr. Pope, a very large number of persons were brought into the Dominion, and altho'the falling off might partly be attributed to the hard times, he believed that unwise legislation also had something to do with it. But as to the cost. In Senator Macpherson's Tupperisms, and as prominent members of the Government have demolished Macpherson's statements long ago, we will meet Mr. Mitchell's borrowed thunder from his "public document" by quoting from the speeches referred to, sufficiently to show that there is about as much in the extravagance charged against the Government as there is in those "cow cases" which formed the burthen of that Barnaby River speech.

Senator Macpherson's appearance on the public arena as an essayist or debater, with two others in the persons of the late Premier and Dr. Tupper, reminds one of a passage in Aytoun's poems, half English and half Gaelic, which describes the feud between the clans Macpherson and McTavish.

F'hairson swore a feud Against the clan McTavish; Marched into their land To murder and to ravish: For he did resolve To extirpate the vipers, With four and twenty men And five and thirty pipers. But when he had gone Half way down Strath Canaan. Of his fightin' tail But three were remainin'. They were all he had To back him in ta battle, All the rest had gone To drive off ta cattle."
