Nacot so's Dazam or Rome. There was cince a village lad whose an one was Nicolas, and whose a village lad whose an one was Nicolas, and whose a village lad whose an one was Nicolas, and whose dram was Rome. This was no idle dream with them, for he had pointed from his childhoo! He would paint he could not help it; and at Paris, to which is cound has way, that he might look at better potures than he could not help it; and at Paris, to which he can he would see at home, he copie drome eigerings from Raphael, which gave a sail firmer eigerings from Raphael he willage of Andels on the Seise—and dreamed of Ro e as he wy out the last of Rome, and panted his way as far as Ffor he; for Rome, and panted his way as far as Ffor he; but not a step could be get beyond, that, and he returned almost in despair to Paris. Here at light he accidentally found a patron, who enling is held to the sail would be get beyond. The firm the told:—Here Nicolas lived for a long time muse ably poor, but supremely happy; starving his body, and banqueting his mind. He fell in with a sculp or called Franci a Flamand, whose circumst ness were similar to his own, and these two lived and laboured in a conner negher, surrounded by the drams and momments of genius, and stealing, out every now and then to sell their works for any pitance what ignorance would bid or avarice affird. But the picture of Nicolas at length began to attract attention; and the himble artist was drawn from his solitude. This change of fortune went on; for silhough piverty or envy may retard the rise of guist for time, when once risen, any attempt to repress it, however powerful, is like opposing a tempest as he afon.
