AMAZING TALE OF DISCOVERY

If what this man Claims is True then not only the Geography of the Earth, but

A NEW RACE OF HUMAN BEINGS

History of the Human Race and of Language must be Revised.

(From the NEW YORK HERALD.)

La Jole was armed only with a knife and a club, but his double suit of skin protected him from the arrows. The next day they were willing to treat for peace. La Jole held two wounded natives as hostages, and the fact that he treated them kindly allowed him to get himself through a little more diplomacy, on good terms with the remainder of the party, which consisted of about forty-five.

He describes the men whom he found as belonging to a strange race, speaking a tongue entirely unlike that of the other natives whom he had met in his travels. Their complexion, he states, was of a reddish brown hue, and their eyes and hair either black or brown. The men were very large, averaging more than six feet in height. Their clothes were made of skins and shaped after a strange fashion.

They took him to their camp, in which was a big tent framed of white bones and covered with animal skins. He remained in the camp five months and learned a few words of their language. The party, having finished the hunt in which they had been engaged, took La Jole with them to their principal settlement.

La Jole found during the time that he was hunting with the natives that he had landed upon one side of a great island. With the party he set out on a five days' journey across a rocky and uneven country.

They came finally to the entrance to a great cave. Leaving La Jole there, the chief in charge of the party entered and summoned to the mouth of the cave the great chief of all the tribe which inhabit that country.

The natives entered in great numbers and stood watching the actions of their chief. Their leader continued the stranger for a period of five minutes, and then said something to his people in their native language.

At the same time he drew a pointed bone arrow, and, fixing it to his bow, pointed it at La Jole. The natives followed the action of their chief. The stranger, thinking that they were about to kill him, turned out of the cave, and ran the range of arrows. Then, stopping, he took from his pocket a flint and steel.

With these he struck fire. La Jole gathered around him and built a fire. For a few minutes the natives watched him, and then approached, threw down their bows and arrows and indicated that they wished to be friends.

They had known nothing of fire previously. When the fire had died out La Jole accompanied the natives to their camp. He describes it as being of enormous size. He states that the stone floor was covered completely with skins of animals which are to be found in the north. Light was let in from apertures cut in the ceiling. Around the walls were various places on which were inserted baskets.

As one side of the cave and in a rich wall was a pedestal, on which was what looked like a throne. On this the natives seated La Jole to be seated, and by various kindly gestures they made him welcome. By this time La Jole was surrounded by a great crowd, which he estimated as numbering thousands. It consisted of men, women and children.

At the base of the mountain the liquid water runs down and is caught in the basin which is a uniform height in the basin. The bubbles diminish in height as the rim of the basin is approached. This liquid is so hot that no one can long remain near it.

COMPASS DISTURBED. "I looked at my compass. The needle was very much disturbed and agitated. I walked around the basin, and invariably the needle pointed toward the mountain in the center. I tried time and again, with the same result. It was then and only then that I conceived that possibly I had discovered the North Pole. Of this fact I am now sure. I have spoken with scientific men of this country, most firmly convinced. I gave to the mountain in the center of the basin the name of Mount Byan.

"The mountain and the basin surrounding it were situated on the highest points of the island. The light is visible from everywhere throughout the island, and for some hundreds of miles beyond. "As a point near which I made my observations of the mountain I discovered a river which rises close to the mountain and flows throughout a great portion of its length in a southerly direction. From its source to its mouth it is about a hundred and fifty miles long.

"In my explorations of the island I discovered three lakes of considerable size, also three large bays which indent the coast. I afterward discovered six other islands, three of which were inhabited. These were of much inferior size to the main island.

"Near the Pole there was a rough kind of grass of a greenish gray color. The soil consisted of clay of all colors. About two thirds of the composition of the island seems to be of stones of various kinds, the other third being of clay soil. The surface of the island was rough as a rule.

"I have lived two years among the natives, and learned in that time their language and how to read the stars. I then determined to turn to civilization. I ordered a boat to build me a boat. This was made of whale skin. It was thirty-five wide and four deep.

"I set out on the return journey two natives. To go over and do hard work during the subsequent five months would be sufficient to repay in lesser degree the trip to the island. The great object of my return was to see the two faithful fellows who were with me that both died before they reached the mainland.

"I reached Nuk-a-lek, Alaska, in the fall of 1894. I there sold my boat for a train of dogs and journeyed overland through Alaska and British Columbia to Ottawa.

La Jole says he carried the bodies of the two natives and many relics, and that he can now readily recover all these proofs of his journey. Admiral Melville, who, at the New York Herald's request, talked with La Jole in Washington, and then to a Herald reporter that, however passing La Jole's story might seem it would be well worth the journey to see the man who made the trip he suggests to secure these relics. Mr. Oliver
