CANADA CANOEING

Canoes and fishing rods: these invelgle most men; they sit up and beam at mention of them—not only men who live with them and by aid men who live with them and by aid of them exist, but men who travel up to the office every morning and to when the void "fish" means only the course before the entries. Many a happy evening have I spent in reading of, such things—reading in some travellor's book of cances and fishing-rois, of rifles and the creckle of the camp-fire. And now the fates permit has to write, it not a book, at article on these as I have of late, had many day. In their company, For their friends and acquaintances I write this, especially for those who can't, just at the monent, arrange their affairs so as to get away from the desk to be among them.

I do not suppose it would be gress free advertisement to give the name of the canoe in which I set out, for it is mentioned in most accounts of Canadian travel; but I will not run the risk of being suspected as a share-holder in the company that makes it, or subsidised it. Suffice it, then to say that the beautiful craft was of the size that caused it to be of the size that caused it to be stamped, on the little bit of decking at the bow, not merely "Canoe", but: "The So-and-So Canoe Boat".
