password which the vicar believed in the prying eyes of Lady Craythorne, they walked hand in hand, content to look into each other's eyes, and readthe love that was theirs.

"What a beautiful world it is," sighed the girl, "under the shining blue of the summer skies. Oh, Charles, why is it not always summer?".

"If it were always summer, darling, we should not see its beauties. It is only by contrast we discover the hope of morning from the despair of night. If life were nothing but sweets, we

"I cannot tell you, dear; I am nevyous and foolish: It is not like my natural self. But I have never had anything of value to lose before, and it may be that we are too happy—too selfish in our happiness!"

"Silly little girl!" he said, lightly. "How is it possible for you to lose me! Do you think that I am a faithless knight? Do you think that I shall love and ride away? Gladys, I could no more live without you now than the trees and the flowers could live without sunshine and rain. A few short days since I had never seen you. I did not even dream of your existence. And now you are my life my very light-

He pressed her tightly to his heart. "There is only one thing that I am sorry for," said Gladys, after a few moments of happy silence. "I wish that I had not treated auntie's fears-auntie's belief-in the cruel legend of the White Lady's Bower, Charles. I have had many evil forebodings since, and ou know that one of my dreams, at least, has proved prophetic."

Sir Charles laughed away her fears, and after a long and happy walk, they emerged from the forest, and saw the crumbling walls of Woodall Castle looming before them.

For half-an-hour they wandered among the ruins, and once or twice the young baronet fancied that he Lord Cecil's "There is no cricket club here, Mr. heard footsteps following them, but quickly dismissed the thought, for the great presence of mind.
