"Ah!" he muttered, with a disagreehalf of shame, leaped to his cheek at the thought, "if I won't work she is bound to, it seems, and to some purpose, too, or I am greatly mistaken." next morning, when they were at breakfast, their landlord entered, bearing a tray, upon which a neatly-folded paper lay.

He approached Philip and presented with his blandest smile and bow, but with a look in his eye which expressed a dogged determination. Philip took up the paper, opened and read it, and then grew white with an-

It was a bill for the past fortnight's board, lodging and washing. He instantly recovered himself, however, and with a smile and bow equally affable as the landlord's own, drop ping the note again upon the tray, he gracefully waived his white, shapely hand toward Arley.

"Madam carries the purse-take it to her," he said in excellent Spanish. The man flushed and glanced uneasily at "madam." It was not according to his ideas of what was right or correct with such business matters; but, after a moment of hesitation, it flashed upon him that perhaps it was an English custom, and therefore all right, and so, turning with an even lower bow to Arley, he held out the salver to her. She also took up the paper, and examined it; but she could not read a word of it, although she saw at a glance that it was in the form of a bill.

"What is it?" she asked of Philip. "What does he want?" "He requests that the bill be settled. and, since I have no money, I have referred him to you; perhaps you can accommodate him with the sum required," Philip replied with averted eyes and rising color.

Arley felt the blood rush back like a torrent upon her heart at this indignity, and knew that she was growing pale; but she also knew that would not do to allow the man, who was watching them closely, to suspec that there was anything wrong; so, biting her lips to keep the color in them, she quietly arose and went to get the money.

She had become familiar enough with Spanish figures to see that the bill called for forty escudos and fifty reals, or between four and five pounds of English money.
