It has been stated that the G. T. R. for some time past has recognized the necessity for a new station in London; but that circumstances have not been favorable for the initiation of the enterprise. One disturbing feature, it is said is the limited space at the disposal of the company in the locality of the present station. West of Richmond street, there is no more than the ordinary track allowance, with no room for the number of lines that are required. East of Wellington street there is plenty of room, especially if the roundhouse is to be removed to the eastern limits of the city. But, very naturally, business people on Richmond street will not like the idea of the station being removed from its present location. It has been suggested that Clarence street might be closed, to the extent, at least-of doing away with the level grossing, and having either a nugway.
