the hour at which the park is most crowded, and every minute a carriage passed containing someone who knew him; the ladies carefully and markedly looked in another direction and avoided him-the gentlemen gave him a smiling nod of recognition. All along the path, the favored promenade of our gilded youth, were familiar faces, and hats flew off to Flossie, and nods were sent to Sir Herrick. Foozle and the prince had been dining there it could not have been better. Presently they came to where Lord Foozle leaned against the rail, his eyeglass in his eye, his chin resting on ted calf! Flossie the Victoria drew up.

"Tell my man to drive on, will you?"

said Flossie, and they drove on.

Like the prisoners whom the Romans dragged at their chariot wheels, Sir Herrick felt himself driven in hers. But what could he do? Inwardly chafing as he was, he could scarcely resent it. It was what he had done, and been content to do, a hundred times before now, and she was not to know that he disliked it. With his handsome face braver and sterner and more troubled and per-plexed, he leaned back. The handsome equipages, with their brilliantly dressed women, passed by him unnoticed. Through all the garish show, the sweet girlish face of Paula rose before him meekly triumphant.

'Fool, fool!" he murmured, "to have relied on good resolutions. If Paula only knew of this! Oh, my darling; what a weak, broken reed is this lover

Though she saw the cloud darkening on his brow, Flossie's cheerfulness did not abate one jot; in fact, she never was in a better and more good-natured mood, and when the Victoria, having made its journey to the saddler's, reached Ragian street, she jumped out

"And we will have a cup of tea and some dinner. You needn't go home to dress, Rick; I'll forgive you for once; you shall sit down in your morning you shall sit down in your morning coat. Afterward, when I am gone to GLOVER TEAM WON that miserable Frivolity, you can dress, and if you want to be a really good boy you can come and see me play.' He went into the drawing-room, where the tea was already standing on one of the pretty gypsy tables, and began pacing the room again. It should not go on, the resolved. He would tell her now, at once. Then he thought of the scene it would produce and his heart failed him. It would be cruel to let her go down to her work heart-broken; he would wait until tomorrow. Then he would write to her. Yes, that was what he would do. And with a sigh he resigned himself to his After all, he had another day. In three days he had promised to be back, Oh, heaven, if Paula should ever learn how these days had been spent!

INOT THE MOST PLEASANT THING

Rugby Practice Has Its Objectionable Features—Another Workout.

That Rugby practice is not the most pleasant thing is the world can be with the boys in Tecumseh Park. After a hard and perhaps tiresome day's work, a hurried dinner, and long walk down to the grounds, the boys have to change their clothes in cold dressingrooms, and get out on the field, and put in about two hours' harder work than any laborer has to do in a similar length of time in the city. Bruises, cuts, sprains, falls, etc., are all in the game, and invariably the person who has been practicing is physically reminded of his evening's play during the whole night and next day. As no pecuniary remuneration is received by any of the players, as pure love of the game and desire to put London at the

The coachman drove straight for the park as usual; but Sir Herrick, lost in thought and mental trouble, did not notice it until they had entered the gates; then he looked up with a start.

"You said you were going to the sad-"

He was silent for a moment: then he leaned back with a sigh. Fate and Flossie were too many for him.

The Victoria entered the line: it was the hour at which the park is most what was sent to Stratford last Sat-urday, and one which will give equally as good an account of itself. Bucking the woman he loved with a love beyond the line is the great point of the game

This ball, said to be liscovered by Stricklett while playing with the California League last season, has made double score games out of the puestion. Jack Chesbro, of the New York lighlanders, has worked it to the best dvantage for his club for over three Chesbro was wise enough to itell the players it was giving him a sore arm, but now the pitchers have discovered that it is simply a medium-paced straight ball, and is less likely to lame the arm than curve pitching.

The batsmen of the American League are than it is utterly impossible to hit that it is utterly impossible to hit ball square, as it breaks in so many different ways just as it reaches the different ways just as it reaches the plate. The ball is sent about waist high, and usually shoots or drops.

Chesbro and Powell are using it constantly with Griffith's team. Mullen, of Detroit, has now mastered it, while Gibson, of the Boston Americans, has used it for some time without his opponents to the fact. Billy Dineen has also mastered the new invention, and being wise to the fact. Billy Dineen has also mastered the new invention, and Dr. White, of Chicago, and other clever pitchers are fast getting control of it. By the time next season opens every first-class pitcher in the business will be throwing "spit" balls to the batsmen. The players claim that it will ruin the batting, and unless the foul strike rule is eliminated, runs will be very scarce next season.

There is another interesting side of this new idea in baseball. If Chesbro can pitch every other day, or six days in the week, if necessary, what need will a club week, if necessary, what need will a clui have for carrying a string of five or six high-priced pitchers? Three box men will suffice under the new conditions. This will suffice under the new conditions. This will save the clubs about $12,000 a season, or the league over $100,000 a year—quite an item, and one well worth considering.

By doing away with the foul strike batting will be increased 25 per cent, the players figure out, in this way offsetting the late invention. This will probably have to be done, for the public will never stand for light stick work. The fielders would then have little chance to display their fielding qualities, and the public would be displeased. There is something for the magnates to ponder over.

"I love the old game as much as ever, and would still be in the business if my interests had been in Detroit instead of Washington." Fred Postal said this to me as a party of newspaper and baseball me as a party of newspaper and baseba is eliminated, runs will be very scarce next season.
