Two or three days later Government Detective Rogers was sent to the scene of the murder from Toronto, and with Detective murder from Toronto, and with Detective McKee to assist him, went to work with great earnestness to solve the mystery of the shooting of Miser Holton. The detectives scoured the whole of Essex county, which adjoins Kent, striving to locate the rig that presumably conveyed the murderers to where their victim lived. In September they were rewarded for their efforts by finding a horse and buggy that answered the description of the one sought at a small village called Harrow. They proceeded at once to this place, taking with them a man from Tilbury who had seen the rig on the day Holton was murdered. This man identified the rig as soon as he saw it. But a short time after this the detectives ascertained that the rig had been taken away a number of weeks before by a young man named Tod Quick.
Quick was placed under surveillance, and subseque-tly was identified positively as the party who hired the rig, and also by two men who saw him at the farm house where he fed the horse.
