Reviewing the financial situation in the United States, Henry Clews says: "It is not pretended that the market will promptly or wholly recover from the terrific shock which it received in irregular markets must be expected with more or less depression and inertia. It must also be remembered that there is comparatively little money available for investment. The country's liquid capital has been practically exhausted, so that time will be required for the accumulation of a fresh supply; and in view of the reactionary tendencies which have developed in business, it is quite probable that a longer period than usual will be required for saving purposes. Another factor which must not be overlooked is that in spite of the large volloked is that in spite of the large volloked. regular markets must be expected with
