experihardly
ng any
beaking
and to
ny own
live any

idual at life, and d in his attempt, ike the he year er-storm nd or on orted on from the nave not ositively now.

medicine ving felt nings of personal ne of the greatest struggles of the present century. It is not a conflict of Britain for gold. It has never been the practice of Britain, and never will, I hope, be her practice, to fight for gold or for the glory of arms. But at the present moment all eyes, from Canada to Australia, and from India to Egypt, are turned upon South Africa, and all are looking with anxious expectation for the result. What will it be? There can be but the one result, the final triumph of British arms. The old order must give way to the new. That splendid country must be redeemed from the misrule of a tyrannical oligarchy. Let us hope the outcome will be all that the interests of Christianity and civilization and British hearts could desire; that in the near future the racial hatred which has cursed that country for three generations may be blotted out, and that the different states and colonies may be welded into one glorious Dominion, and British supremacy be forever established.