MONA.

FROM THE BRETON. At even-tide sits Mona, still

In reverie, by the spring; Her little head is thinking not Of any happy thing.

For, like a broken string of pearls, And in the clear pool absently Play her bare feet and brown.

And singing, thus doth say : "O maiden, with uneasy feet Stir not the water, pray;

"For when you the water trouble With restless feet so small, I can not my likeness see therein. Nor the little stars at all."

The maiden says: "Oh, fear you not, Nor, little bird, complain; The troubled water will soon be pure And mirror-like again.

"But, ah ! when oft I wandered here, Happy at twilight dim, Why saidst thou not to hin

"Oh, Januik! Jannik! trouble not The maiden's heart so clear, Lest heaven be mirrored there no more Lest there no stars appear ?"

Poor Dafford blossom! what's that to thee Thou hast no part in its golden glow -Thou hast no share in its silver dew-It will not wake thee to life anew. What sidder fate can the Autumn bring Than Summer does to a flower of Spring

It is midsummer, my life's midsummer-My sorrowing Heart ! what's that to thee ! Its joys are things that I can not share Tis not for me that its days are fair; For Love for me was an April flower, Whose beauty went with the passing hour. What sadder fate can the Autumn bring Than Summer does to a flower of Spring ?
