AMERICANS WIN AT TENNIS. PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 13.—The United States defeated the British today in the third and decisive match of the Davis cup lawn tennis series on the courts of the Germantown Cricket Club. R. D. Little and J. H. Hackett defeated the doubles of J. C. Parke and W. C. Crawford by 3-5, 6-4, 6-4, 6-3, 8-6. This result decides the preliminary tie and makes America the challenger nation against Australasia, which now holds the coveted blue ribbon of the tennis world. Tomorrow the single matches will be continued. W. A. Larned meeting Parke and W. J. Clothier playing C. P. Dixon. The result of these matches will not, however, affect the championship.

THE LAUGHTER OF LIFE

A NOVEL AND A VERY INTERESTING ONE.

Copyright 1908 By MARIA ALBANESI

"I am so sorry my uncle cannot dine with us," she said, "he is too much fatigued; but I hope you will meet him tomorrow."

Bertha looked rather wan, as though she were tired. "You will take in my aunt, I want to present you to her. Drusilla, you two girls must go in together."

Mrs. Lingfield chose to be unusually amiable to the young man brought up to her, and, later, as she sailed into the dining room on the arm of Mr. Keston, she vouchsafed the information that on company years ago she had known some people bearing the same name as his own.

"I lost sight of them when my husband and I went to live abroad, and I have often wondered what became of Rosalie Keston; she was a very pretty woman."

"My mother's name was Rosalie," Brian said, but he spoke quietly, almost uninterestedly.

"A strange coincidence," Mrs. Lingfield turned her well-organized smile on the young man. "And what was your father's name?" It would be odd if you should happen to be my old friend's son, Mr. Keston."

But the information she naturally expected was not forthcoming. "No doubt an excellent young man," Mrs. Lingfield said to herself, and for the remainder of the dinner she talked to Lord Carlingford. But while she chattered, her mind was working in an odd channel, recalling old things, and all at once there came to her a remembrance which explained much that Brian Keston had left unsaid.

As she was rising from the table she turned again to him. "Forgive me for reminding you of old things, but it was true that your father was involved in that Spanish smut?" I remember he was a very great friend of Lord Spangh, and we always feared he might be sacrificed as so many others did."

"He lost my fathering he had in the world," Brian Keston said quietly; "it was that which killed him."

"Poor fellow!" said Mrs. Lingfield with a sigh; "it was a terrible business." She moved away and passed out into the drawing-room. Bertha followed her to the piano and gave her a look which remained to introduce the two men, but Keston was only too glad to escape to his room, and Lord

Carlingford was left to sit and smoke alone.

In the drawing-room Connie Lingfield talked about him frankly. "He is awfully handsome, Drusilla!" "Yes, isn't he? And he wears such nice clothes," said Drusilla in her latest fashion, for which no doubt he never pays.

Connie laughed. "He looks as if he could make anyone who owed him anything! Drusilla, he has a temper!"

"Who hasn't?" "He has only come here now because she heard a rumor that he was madly in love with you, and she felt she must know what was going to happen!"

At this Drusilla changed color. "I don't know what Aunt Edith has heard, or who can have been telling her things about me. It is certainly a little premature to marry me to a man I have only known one short week."

It was so unusual for Drusilla to speak coldly that her cousin opened her rather engaging eyes. "You shan't marry anyone if you don't want to," she said soothingly. "And Drusilla laughed, for it struck her that this was rather the reverse of the actual case."

"Come over here," she said, leading the way to the piano. "Lord Carlingford shall sing to us." When they were well out of earshot, she said to Miss Lingfield: "Connie, darling, you won't let Aunt Edith worry me about this, will you? Really, it is too absurd!"

"Well, I don't know. I am not given to jumping at conclusions as mother does as a general rule, still, you must confess, Drusilla, circumstances are going a long way to prove her case. She literally gasped when she heard he was coming to dinner. Of course, he must have intentions of some sort, else why should he be down here?"

Drusilla sat down on the music stool. "Oh, Connie," she said, "do be an angel and marry him yourself! You can't think how much obliged I should be to you."

"And how grateful Lord Carlingford would be! I must think it over. But, actually, here he comes! I suppose you don't want me to propose now right away?"

Drusilla pinched her cousin and then looked at her with a mischievous twinkle in her eyes. "Lord Carlingford," she said, "Mrs. Lingfield has something to ask you."

The other girl started and blushed in confusion, but quickly recovered herself. "We want you to sing to us," she said a little breathlessly. "Please do."

CHAPTER IV.

Lord Carlingford possessed, it appeared, quite a pretty musical talent. Drusilla threw herself into a low chair and listened to the piano and gave her up to real enjoyment. She did not hear Connie Lingfield steal away after the second song to pay a visit to her twenty minutes' fighting the combatants were level, with a score of two slight wounds each. In three minutes more Gerard pierced Ange's wrist, which began to swell—and the fight was stopped.

But those who were present declare that the fight was splendid. "Capt. Gerard," says an admiring witness, "wears a silk shirt and trousers. Capt. Ange's shirt is of fine linen. The former is muscular and slim, the latter powerfully built, but short-legged, and wears glasses."

"First engagement: The two men watch each other. Capt. Ange attacks; Capt. Gerard hits with the fist. "Second engagement: The foe has changed sides. They watch each other again, then attack rapidly. Capt. Gerard lunges, Capt. Ange catches him in the arm. A scratch. The fight goes on. Third engagement: The fight is animated. The two adversaries fence beautifully. The strokes are precise and straight, but there are no hits."

"Fourth engagement: New swordsmen are used, the others being blinded. Same play as before. Fifth: Capt. Ange lunges; Capt. Gerard catches him in the wrist. The wound having been dressed, the fight goes on. Sixth: The two men are still game. More fine fencing. Seventh: Two hits, both sword-points picking the forearm. Eighth: Captain Gerard worries his adversary, who is slackening. The former, in a rush, pierces Capt. Ange's arm. The fight is stopped. Capt. Ange's hand and arm swell visibly; he cannot hold his sword. The duel is over. The foe are not reconciled. They separate without a word."

As he was walking away, however, Capt. Gerard expressed his respect for Ange, who, he said, had acted as he ought to have done. "I profoundly admire the courage of the man; but I have not altered my opinions."

"I have just assisted at one of the finest combats which I have seen in all my long career," says the famous fencer, M. Thomegas, adding to the description, "The two swordsmen were well worthy of one another. They were equally courageous, they had a very personal style with their blades, and they gave us a glorious show of swordsmanship. They were well matched, neither stood on the defensive, and each attacked incessantly."

"Sportmen both and physically fit, they charged one another a la française, going at it with zest, but always remaining conservative swordsmen, leaving nothing to chance, and fencing with their brains as well as their blades with a knowledge of swordsmanship that proves them to be doughty champions. There are two real men for you," before Capt. Ange will be able to use his right arm. Capt. Gerard's wounds are less severe."

MAGNETS FOR EYE HOSPITALS. Many hospitals in England are provided with a special apparatus for extracting iron and steel fragments from the eye by means of powerful electric magnets. The magnet employed has a core three feet long and six inches in diameter of the best Swedish soft iron. Two hundred pounds of insulated wire are wound in two coils about the core. The end of the magnet is threaded to receive terminals of different shapes to suit various conditions. The magnet is mounted on ball bearings, and can be moved in any direction. The strength of the magnet field may be varied at will by means of a rheostat. When used at its maximum power, the magnet carries a pull of 20 seconds per square inch at a distance of an inch. A special type of apparatus is provided for rectifying patients. In this case the magnet is mounted on a transverse axis and is tilted by means of a cable starting operated by a hand crank.

"Edmund," asked a little boy's aunt during dinner, "what is your favorite flower?" "Cornflowers," replied Edmund, who had obtained good information as to the next course.
