

A MOTHER'S TRIAL.
O, turn not away from me with scorn,
From her pale, sad face, and her tender form;
There's a burning pain in her tender eye,
And the mother's bosom that will not dry,
Shall the voice which hath soothed thy child,
Now moans for the cause of thy sister's joy.
O, turn not away! there's a whisperer prayer
In the sighing words and the weeping eye,
And a warning voice which commands the stay,
For thy feet grow old in the downward way,
How the days arrive, when thy fostered breast
May return no more to its former rest.
O, turn not away! 'tis thy mother's voice,
Which, ere she's dead, has to thy better choice,
Wouldst thou that the ones which will bless thee
Still, should be the ones which will bless thee
Still.
Though the glance of her eye be cold and still,
Alas! look yet again on her eyes now brown,
'Tis thy work which wouldst thou close it now.
O, turn not away! 'tis thy mother's voice,
In the guilty eye which thy soul would drain,
There are weary days, whose restful night
Cometh not to thee with departing light,
Have thy sin-bought pleasures become so dear,
That thy soul would make its hell here?
