De Pontibus.

(CONCESSIONS AND THOUGHTS OF DEPTHS OF NIGHT)

When the clocks are striking the hour, As an awful illustration Of the power of government's power.

I had my own reflections Concerning G. J. B.

And wished he was of the Texas Or sent on a voyage to sea.

For the people were indignant That the Government should dare To lay its hands on the people's power.

And when I thought of Bridges And his wooden-headed peers I felt there were worse men somewhere To be felt in future years.

And I thought of the many thousands
Of laboring men,
And I thought of the many thousands
Of laboring men.

I see the long procession Still passing out and in, Each saying that this appointment Was several times too thin.

But never and forever
While the Government nothing knows, As long as Mackenzie has power To do as he pleases.

This miserable selection Of Bridges shall appear A symbol of Ottawa folly And its consequences here.

—New Dominion and True Humanist.

Murat Halstead in London.

Murat Halstead writes home a pleasant, sketchy letter of what he saw in London.

Having seen that in "The Times" he notes that in the third act the splendor of her diamonds was astounding. There were coronets and necklaces and girle bands and bracelets and rings of diamonds, a diamond bouquet on her bo-some, and as she moved she glittered from head to foot in a degree that was dazzling.

Of course, he says, when we are in the Derbyshire estate of the most famous funeral gravity. He looked aged and saw the closely shaven face was very plain, with a sickly saffron tinge; his eyes were dull and sunken, and his hair was thin. The lines in his face are deep and strange, and those of an overworked and sorrowful man. When he came up to speak and removed his hat, the celebrated front looked quite actual, and he seemed to be in constant care and cultivation. At the white-table dinner of the Cobden Club, he was struck with the importance of the English toastmaster, who stands behind the chairman, and in a fierce, sand-papered voice perpetually directs the proceedings, reads the toasts, calls the speakers, proposes cheers, and gives them enthusiasm. A man utterly devoted to the discharge of his duty. He thinks the best custom of bowling down bore beautiful, and one which Americans should adopt. Of Holman Heard, he says, "The Shadow of Death," he says: "A more absurd picture was never painted."

Remarkable Escape from Death.

Mr. Ten Brock, whose name is familiar to all horsemen, and Gen. Whitaker, he was in a Kentucky railway carriage. Mr. Ten Brock got out at a station where he had business to transact. Gen. Whitaker also left the train, and meeting Mr. Ten Brock on the platform, he commenced to quarrel with him. Mr. Charles A. Lewis and Col. R.

H. Crittenden, of Frankfurt, were testified in Whitaker's following trial before the coroner's inquest. Mr.

Crittenden stated that he saw Whitaker approach Ten Brock in a hostile manner.

Ten Brock, waving both hands before his face, told Whitaker repeatedly to go away, that he didn't want to have anything more to do with him. If any other words passed between the parties they were not heard by the witnesses.

Whitaker continued to advance, and within a few feet of Mr. Ten Brock drew a pistol and fired twice at him.

The pistol was empty, and Whitaker rushed toward him. Whitaker fired a third time, but again without effect.

Ten Brock closed in upon his adversary, and a struggle ensued, but the struggle was quickly ended. Whitaker releasing

Mr. Ten Brock's arm, he placed the muzzle of the pistol to the old gentleman's forehead and fired. Mr. Ten Brock instantly fell insensible, and as many supposed dead, upon the platform. After he was down, Whitaker presented pistol and again attempted to fire at his prostrate body, and was only prevented from doing so by the several of the men who gathered on the platform who rushed forward and wrested the pistol from his hands. Mr. Ten Brock remained insensible; the blood flowed freely from a hole in his forehead, and every one who saw him was impressed with the belief that he was killed. After his wound was dressed Mr. Ten Brock was conveyed to his home in a carriage.

Before being taken away he became again conscious, and conversed with his friends.

He did not seem to fear any serious results from the wound, and only complained of extreme weakness. Mr. Ten Brock is over sixty years old, and quite feeble, and the shock of such an affir was of itself sufficient to produce serious prostration.

The St. Croix Courier says that the net proceeds of the St. Stephen Catholic Pic Nic amount to $2000.

Anna Dickinson is writing the story of her life, and dozens of young fellows in various parts of the country are earnestly beseeching her to say nothing "about
