First, she combed Taffy's hair. Oh! miserable girl. She closes two azure eyes with two slender fingers from the light of day, as this thought occurs to her. Then, she smirked at her own graceless image in Taffy's glass, and made all sorts of conceited remarks about her personal appearance, and then she said she hoped to subjugate "him." What "him" could there be but this one? and of course he knows it. Oh! unhappy of course he knows it. Oh! unhappy young woman!

As for Taffy, bad, bad boy that he is, never to give her a hint. Vengeance surely is in store for him. What right had he to forget? If there is one thing she detests, it is a person devoid of tact. If there is one thing she could adore, it would be the power to shake the wretched Taffy out of his shoes.

What is there left to her but to gain her room, wheat beat head headache, and what is there left to her but to gain her room, plead bad headache, and spend the remainder of the evening in retirement? In this mood she gains the drawing-room door, and, hesitating before it, thinks better of the solitary confinement idea, and, entering the room, seats herself in a cozy chair and prepares to meet her fate with admirable calmness.

Lady Chetwoode instantly says, with discontinuous discontinuous area.

old-fashioned grace, the sweeter that it is somewhat obsolete : "Lilian, permit me to introduce to you your cousin, Archibald Chesney."

Whereupon Lilian bows coldly and refuses to meet her cousin's eyes, while kind Lady Chetwoode thinks it is a little stiff of a child, and most unlike her, not to shake hands with her own kin.

An awkward pause is almost inevitable, when Taffy says out loud, to no one in particular, but with much gusto:

"How odd it is they should never have sage, sage, they would never have sage sage. seen each other until now !" after which he goes into silent agonies of merriment over his own wit, until brought to his senses by an annihilating glance from Idian.

The dinner-hour is remarkable for nothing excep. Lilian's silence. This, being so utterly unexpected, is worthy of note. After dinner, when the men gain the drawing-room, Archibald, coming over, deliberately pushes aside Miss Chesney's velvet skirts, and seats himself on the low ottoman beside her with modest determination. Miss Chesney, raising her eyes, regards him curiously.

He is tall, and eminently gloomy appearance. His hair is of a rare black-ness, his eyes are dark, so is his skin. His eyebrows are slightly arched, which gives him an air of melancholy protes against the world in general. His nose is of the high and mighty order that comes under the denomination of aquiline, or hooked, as may suit you best. Before his arrival Cyril used to tell Lilian of AWONDERFUL REMEDY that if nature had meant him for any thing it was to act as brigand in a private theatre; and Lilian, now calling to mind this remark, acknowledges the truth of this remark, acknowledges the truth of the dark.browed cousin. Nevertheless, she refrains from outward mirth, which is wisdom on her part, as ridicule is his bete naire.

Despite the extreme darkness of his complexing he is unmistakably and produced to it. It will arrest homorphage, and prevent consumption he is unmistakably and produced to it. It will are consumption if seasonably en Despite the extreme darkness of his complexion he is unmistakably handsome, though somewhat discontented in expression. Why, no one knows. He is rich, courted, as are all young men with a respectable rent-roll, and toight have made many a titled debutante Mrs. Chesney had he so chosen. He has not even a romantic love affair to fall back upon as an excuse for his dejection; no unfortunate attachment has arisen to sour his existence. Indeed, it is seldom the owner of landed property has to complain on this score, all such luxuries being reserved for the poor of the earth. Archibald Chesney's gloom, which is becoming it anything, does not sink deeper than his skin. It gives a certain gentleness to his face, and prevents the ignorant from guessing that he is one of the wildest, maddest young men about London. Lilian, regarding him with quiet scrutiny, decides that he is good to look at, and that his eyes are peculiarly large and dark.

"Ary you angry with me for what happened up-stairs?" he asks, gently, after a pause spent in as earnest an examination of her as any she has bestowed upon him.

"Up-stairs?" says Lilian, with raised lexion he is unmistakably hand- 3. The action of the digestive organs will be

"Have you not? I have. I have been utterly miserable ever since you bestowed that terrible look upon me when your eyes first met mine. Won't you let me explain my presence there? I think if you do you will forgive me."
