Blind foreign policy

—On Monday, November 7, 1983, Canadian foreign-policy makers 'quietly' allowed "Aeroflot," the only airline which connects North America with the Soviet Union, to resume its commercial flights to Montreal.

This 'sneaky' change of policy was stealthily enacted under-the-table and away from the public view. The action was markedly unlike the bold announcement by External Affairs Minister Allan MacEachen, after the pilot of the Soviet Sukhoi-15 interceptor blasted the Korean Air Lines flight 007 out of the skies killing all 269 people aboard, including several Canadians.

On Sept. 7, 1983 the Government of Canada banned all Soviet airlines to Canada in protest of the so-called callous action on the part of the Soviet military.

The White House announced on Sept. 2 that immediate U.S. steps would be mainly symbolic, i.e. (1) suspension of negotiations with the Soviets for a new consular agreement and expanded scientific and cultural exchanges; and (2) an appeal to other nations to suspend air service to and from the USSR for 60 days.

The Canadian Government, not to be outdone, demanded an apology as well as compensation for the families of the Canadian victims from the Soviet Union.

When neither of the two demands appeared to be forthcoming, the Canadian government banned the only USSR air service to Canada (and to North America, since the US had previously banned all Soviet flights from American soil after the Russian invasion of Afghanistan and the repression in Poland via martial law).

Over the years Canada has been criticized, by some observers of its foreign policy, for not taking a stand on foreign policy matters, and for being inconsistent in its foreign-policy statements. In fact some critics are even so bold as to suggest that Canada's foreign-policy is non-existent.

I must admit that when I heard the 'rumour' (now a confirmed fact) last Monday that a Soviet airliner with 39 people aboard was quietly allowed to land in Montreal, it started to confirm my suspicion about Canada's inconsistent or non-existent foreign policy.

But immediately I remembered that it was exactly 60 days ago that Allan MacEachen had announced the banning of the USSR airlines to Canada. Canada by removing that 'ban' was following 'sheep-like' along with President Reagan's appeal to nations to suspend air service to and from the USSR for 60 days.

This leads me to conclude that Canada does have a foreign policy and a consistent one as well. This could be another example of the 'blind following the blind' . . . they both could end up in the ditch.
