Above in the branches a tiny bird easays to sing, but stops half stilled, and, forgetting the tuneful note, contents it self with a lazy "cluck cluck" that presently degenerates still further into a dying "coo" that is hardly musical, because so full of sleep.

Molly has seated herself on the soft young grass, beneath the shade of a mighty beech, against the friendly trunk of which she leans her back. Even this short walk from the house to the six stately beeches that are the pride and glory of Brooklyn has told upon her. Her usual merry eyes have subsided into a gentle languor; over them, the white lids droop heavily. No little fairness tinge of color adorns her pale cheeks, upon her lap her hands lie idle, their very listlessages betokening the wont of energy they feel.

At about two yards distant from her reclines her guest, full length, his fingers interlaced behind his head, looking longer, slighter, than usual as with eyes upturned he gazes in silence upon the fact, in the slow, indifferent tone that belongs to heat, as the crisp gay voice belongs to cold. "In ever heard you silent so long before. Do you think you are likely to dide? Because—don't do it here it would give me such a shook."
