* I ou called this young girl's name Frederica.'

Libink I know now, who it is, and you have no cause for rivilry. It it is the person I suspect, it is

Daily's half sister: I have heard lately that he had a roution delty, hard some half-sister who was a miller, "And, but for other matters on hand I should have reied to make her acquaintages."

The lady is in 'No. She seemed as pure as she was 'Sie s love of the brother.'

Dare to think or speak of her lightly, Mr. Ellery, and I-Tut, titt, man, You are too fiery and quick take offcuce altogether. The young woman

No ; the is no relation to him. She is only adopted by the mith r. I am sure of this, for inquired of Mrs. Daily herself while purchasing handkerchief at her counter. I had heard she we a sister, as you have believed she was, and this le me to make certain of it. She is no relation.

He probably regards her as a siete. I don believe he loves her. He had no other person i.

his heart than Grave.' 'I am satisfied be likes this person better then care he should. Besides, I have seen his accursed lip press her check, and this I can never forgive.

The man shall no more stand in my way than in Ellery laughed lightly at Clow's determine manner, and said,

What will you do? You would not kill him?

No. I would only destroy him so far that hi shall be his helk. I would not kill a man, I woul bu avenged upon.

Oh, no! This would be foll

When we many is dead, ho be avenged upon. Oh, no! This would be foll as great as hanging. When my enemy is dead, how can he suffer? how can I injure, torture, glut my vengence? I might as well forgive him as killhim; for dead, I should ceare to hate, and he is feel. No, no; he shall live—but degraded?

What a devil in hatted you are, Clow.'

*Hare and revenge are not monopolies for the white race, nowwered Claw, derisively. James white race, answered Claw, derisively. James Daily having suffered enough to sate yours, mustion suffer to glut toine. It is not enough for me that he has been degraded in the estimation of our man; the man Philip Clow hated must be dugraded and linfamous to the world, blackened with every crime which an honest man would about. The mulatto made no answer, but throwing open a dark, polished maliogany door, which was ajar, he ushered him into an apartment richly and tastefully furnished and filled with a soft dreamy light like that produced by moun-beams intercepted by ganze curtains. To Ellery's vision, coming in from the bright hall, the room appeared obscure at first, but by degrees he became accustomed to the mellow radiance that pervaded for place, and was enabled to discern objects distincily, jet with wavy outlines. There was no person in the room that he could seed. He had hardly entered when the door closed behind him, shutting out the glare-from the chandelier in the hall? He dobkel around. The roundation had disappeared. He had hardly time to feel surprise when his ears were arrested by low, soft notes of music, that came he know not whonce. They sounded not early far off, and to his heart to cease its benting. He stood transfixed the ocume from the most distant skies. Louder, sweeter, still it came, making his blood thrill and his heart to cease its benting. He stood transfixed the one entranced. Whether the music was vocal or instrumental he could not tell; whether in the room or in heaven. He was bewildered, and for a mountained his own waking identity.

or instrumental ne could not tell; whether in the room or in heaven. He was bewildered, and for a moment questioned his own waking identity.

Nearer and clearer, yet still soft and melodious, like the tones of a harp and a human voice flowing together, as meeting rivulets mingle their waters, it rether, as meeting rivulets mingle their waters, it was reconstantly by the surface of the tones of the tones of a harp and a human voice flowing together, as meeting rivulets mingle their waters, it was reconstantly by the surface of the tones.
