The New Welsh Nationalism

Mr. Hall Caine on the Investiture of the Prince and the Motive Which Lies Behind It.

The Daily Telegraph was fortunate in securing the most brilliant description of the scene in Carnarvon last Thursday, the scene which Mr. Balfour said was the most moving of all the historical ceremonials he had ever witnessed. It was from the pen of Mr. Hall Caine. Here are some of the glowing passages in his report—

"It was a drama—a drama with a great motive, and the motive has been the same as that of the great Welsh Renaissance, which is at once the most moving and the most momentous fact in modern Welsh life. The new Welsh nationalism—the nationalism that is both new and old, to permanent subjection? Oh, wild irony of history: on this spot of all others, this last seaward reach of the untamable regions of the Welsh home of the Welsh, that were reared to quell it, we celebrate to-day the crowning triumph not only of English Royalty and magnanimity, but of that unconquerable Welsh independence which our English Justinian had spent his strength to put down.

Act II.

"The second act of to-day's drama began, for some of us, this morning, when we made our way to the town's pavilion, where the Mayor of Carnarvon was giving a luncheon to his countrymen from all quarters of the Principality. In the midst of such a preliminary scene, was it possible to forget other gatherings of long ago that had a far different significance—was it possible not to think of other and more hostile groupings on the same historic spot by the greatest of all Welshmen, perhaps, Owen Glendower, who, gathering up in his magnetic person all the volcanic and outraged patriotism of the Welsh people, claimed the sovereignty of Wales, called himself its rightful Prince, burnt down castle after castle which the great Crusader had set up, called a Welsh Parliament, re-established a Welsh church, and carried through it all a charmed life—until, the christian element getting the better of him, he disappeared as swiftly as he came, the brilliant meteor of Welsh history? Does it wrong the past to say that in that preliminary assembly, this morning, the spirit of the great Welshman expressed itself again in the person of the most magnetic and powerful Minister in England, or, perhaps in Europe, at this hour? Lord George was there, David to one-half of that eager company, 'Davie' to the other half, and credited by all with the highest influence in bringing about this day's brilliant business.

Acts III and IV.

"The third act began at noon, when we gathered in the Castle. It self, an immense concourse of people, out of all calculation in number. What a spectacle! Once more a Prince of seventeen years, another Edward of Carnarvon, another David, too, as he said in his charming speech, is coming to be invested with these walls.

"The fourth act was the moment when, after long waiting under a brooding sun, broken only at intervals by the supremely beautiful and the crowds without in the soul-stirring strains of the great Welsh song, 'Land of my Fathers.' It was thrilling. I don't know if it was the Celt in me, or the democrat, or the poet, however insignificant, which made me think it the most moving moment of my life, blinding my eyes with tears and choking my throat with sobs. However this may be, of one thing I feel sure: if any spectator had down to that moment any misgivings about the real meaning of to-day's pageant, any idea that it was nothing more than a paltry patchwork of theatricalities, a thing of tinsel, a mummery, a foolish survival from a feudal age that is dead and gone, he must have been convinced at last that the practical heart of it was, as I said at the beginning, the triumph of the Welsh Renaissance, the new Welsh Nationalism.—Public Opinion, July 21, 1911.

PHILOSOPHER.

My nerves were never then unduly fairly touched by my downy bed, and night seemed but two long father climbed the stairs and chairs, and pulled me from my slumber on my head, and rolled to sleep and snore. And now that I am older than a year, I do not roost but come across, or if it comes I have with my screams. How often I have with my calmly snore! How often I shine and bumped my nose, while my sleepless sleeping room! How the boons that youth enjoys, this like the sheeted dead is first and ve been brought to my notice since which, had I known them before, could have made it perfectly impossible for me to have written the statement I did.

The Speaker said he was quite ready to accept the apology so frankly and freely offered. "I do not complain of fair comment, but I did rather feel that the imputation on my member had cast upon me did not come quite within that category, I am perfectly confident that my judgment has never for one instant been used by any sense of partiality, and general cheers.) In the circumstances I hope that Colonel Lockwood did not desire me to put the motion.

"Colonel Lockwood fell in with the speaker's suggestion, and the incident came to an end.
