ANNABEL

THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

PHILIP WRESTLED IN THE DEPTHS OF WORSHIP.
RIVALRY AT ROCKSTONE—A TALENTED.
All three were anxious and restless, and Mr. Langton no less than the other two, but his restlessness and anxiety were of quite a different kind and from another cause. He was plunged in genuine grief and despair. Not only did he bitterly mourn the death of Annabel, but his sorrow for Philip was of the most poignant description, as he trembled with agitation in view of meeting him and seeing his suffering. As yet, so unfeigned was his pity and sympathy for the youth in his bereavement that he would gladly have relinquished all the financial relief which Annabel's death had brought him, if she could have been restored to life. But, alas! this he felt could not be. She was dead, the blow was irreparable, and the grief abiding.
At length the noise of wheels was heard, which stopped at the hall door; then came the sound of footsteps in the lobby.
Mr. Langton made an effort to go out to meet Philip, but his agitation was such that he was positively unable. Summoning all his resolution, the merchant rose from his chair and hastened across the room to the door, which opened from without as he neared it, and instinctively he opened his arms to embrace Philip.
But at the sight presented to his view he staggered back in horror. It seemed to be not Philip, but his specter that entered. For the dreadful change in the youth's appearance, the merchant was wholly unprepared, and the shock caused him to recoil some steps backward, uttering the ejaculation—
"Good God!"
Then, in the paleness and emaciation in the haggard face and shrunken frame he read the awful extent of the poor youth's suffering, and with a great cry and a bursting sob, he sprang forward and threw his arms round Philip's neck.
"O, my boy—my poor, dear boy," he murmured. More he could not say; all the rest was expressed in the violent emotion which shook their souls, for Philip broke down likewise, and he wept more freely than he had done since the dreadful news had reached him.
Mrs. Langton sat at the upper end of the room looking on. Could she really behold that sight and not be impelled by remorse to shriek out her guilt, and end the misery which had wrought such havoc, and was boring Philip's manly frame to the very dust? Hardened, selfish, cruel, as she was, could she remain unshaken in the horrible purpose she had carried through?
Yes, she could. Disturbed she certainly was at the sight of his and her husband's grief, and her heart beat fast and strong under her bodice, but not with pity, not with remorse—only with fear lest a discovery should be made.
It was several minutes ere that terrible gush and flood of emotion spent its first outbreak. Gradually, however, the two men grew calmer, and Mrs. Langton feeling it necessary to act a part, rose and came down to where they were, her grand stiff, mourning dress sweeping the floor and rustling as she moved.
This was a sad distressing meeting, Philip, she said and managed to throw the appropriate tone into her words.
"O, who would have expected this when you went away?"
He turned and took the hand she held to him, and the silent pressure he bestowed on it was his only reply.
To answer her in words was for him impossible. He could but cast one brief glance into her face, and seeing there what seemed to be tears standing in her eyes he turned aside, and dropping into a large chair, abandoned himself to a calmer and relieving fit of weeping.
"My boy, this will never do," sobbed Mr. Langton, patting Philip's shoulder very tenderly. "It is, I am aware, a sore blow for you, but you must not—for all our sakes you must not—allow it to affect you so heavily.
"Is it the coming to this place where Annabel lies that has moved the youth?
"Is it like the wound re-inflicted. I will get calmer soon; I am calmer even now. This has relieved me. I feared the meeting, yet longed for it, since now I shall hear all particulars of the dreadful event."
Old LONDON is now enjoying a religious sensation similar in character and nearly equal to that produced by Pere Hyacinthe, a few years since, in Notre Dame, Paris. The central figure in the London excitement is Monsignor Capel, a Catholic preacher of Ultramontane type; and the Protestant cathedral in Kensington, where he holds forth, is crowded every Sunday evening with an eager audience, including many Protestants of the upper classes. Capel, who it will be remembered figures as one of the characters in "Lothair," is described as a fine looking man, with a grand voice, a keen eye, and a perfect master of the most simple yet vigorous style of the English language. He has a real belief that the only hope of any human soul and society lies in his Church, and when kindled up with his subject is eloquent in the extreme. But it is in the boldness with which he arraigns high society for its coarse materialism and its vices that he produces the effect of the sensation he produces. The Church of England requires a scathing dissection at his hands, and its worshippers are told plainly by him and by his co-agitator, Manning, that every so-called superstitious of their Church now finds shelter in the Church of England, without the corresponding comforts, sacraments, and unity which their own church supplies; they may as well believe a dozen miracles as one, or in the infallibility of a living church as well as that of a dead prophet.
A fellow named Lee, from the States, who has been making and selling "concentrated lemonade" in Hamilton during the last few weeks, has cleared out
