

and the city chief of police were the main actors. The cop of whom we hope soon to be able to speak as "our dear departed brother, the late John Toyser, Esq.," hearing a noise, proceeded according to his custom to pounce upon the most innocent and the least pugnacious man in the crowd, who happened to be Fen, a ministerial student of '93, and ushered him into the drawing room of the lock up and told him to take a seat and make himself at home. Finding himself left alone Fen lit the gas, and taking a book, "The laws which govern the town of Wolfville," from the well filled shelf, he amused himself for about twenty minutes with its contents. A mass meeting of the boys was called, and to soothe their angry spirits the first, second and last stanzas of that sublime hymn "The cop climbed over the mountain" were sung by the college quartette, the whole audience joining in on the chorus. Fen finally was released on bail, and on his examination before the magistrate no fault was found in him. The cop's remarks concerning the parentage of the boys were given with considerable emphasis, but with little regard for politeness.
