

because the children in play fell or otherwise soiled their dresses. The little Parkers had nothing to dread from her if they came in with a torn frock or buttons off. She knew it was not from any fault or love of wilful mischief, and she never made complaints about it to their mamma, but tried to rectify all evils herself; and so far the little Parkers were almost the happiest among all the groups of children which assembled daily on the beach. One morning, Esther had gone out as usual to sit with them under the rocks, when Miss Marston was surprised at hearing their voices in the passage an hour sooner than she expected. She hastened out of her room, and found Esther looking much frightened and little John crying. The matter was soon explained. While Esther was talking busily to another nurse, the little fellow had slipped away from her and had fallen off one of the rocks. She could find no bruises or cuts, but as he screamed for some minutes, she feared he must be hurt, and, added she, "I thought, Ma'am, it was best to come home and speak of it directly."

"Quite right, Esther," said Miss Marston. "Never conceal an accident. My nurse let me fall out of her arms when I was a baby, and was afraid to tell of it. The consequence was, I am a cripple, my back was injured, and no one found it out till I began to walk. It is a cruel and wicked thing to hide such accidents, for, if taken in time, bad consequences may often be avoided."

A medical man was sent for, who after examining little John, said he had broken one of his ribs. How thankful Esther felt that she had acted in a straightforward truthful manner, and had not done as the other nurse, with whom she had been sitting on the beach, advised, namely, "Say nothing about it!" And then when she remembered all that poor Miss Marston suffered from bad health, and the great trial her crookedness must have been to her all her life, she prayed that she might never be tempted, from a want of moral courage, from fear of blame, to hide an accident. She blamed herself now for having been in some measure drawn off from her duty in losing sight of John while talking to the other servant.

The child had to be kept quite still, and although he did not suffer much pain, he was of so eager and restless a disposition that it was a very difficult matter to manage him; and to speak the truth, Esther had so much spoilt him by making the others and everything give way to him, in order to please him and keep him quiet, that she now began to see how foolish and ill-judged it was. The servant girl who came with them was obliged to take charge of the three others, that Esther might nurse John. The girl was a very quiet timid creature, and she could not at all manage them, particularly Augusta, who had grown very wilful and passionate lately. She and Esther were always having squabbles, and Esther began thoroughly to dislike her, and always spoke of her as naughty and beyond all control, whereas the fault lay in a great measure with herself. She had begun by being out of temper and hasty with Augusta, instead of quietly but firmly making her mind what was said. Miss Marston saw all this, and tried to have Augusta with her as much as possible, and she talked to her about it, and tried to make her understand and see how wrong it was.

But it is a difficult task, and a very sad one, when speaking to children of these things, and telling them they must obey their nurse, if you are obliged to allow that this nurse does just the very same things herself; and they answer as Augusta used to say to Miss Marston: "I am sure, if I speak rudely Esther does—she always does, cousin, and when I mean to be good she begins by calling me naughty, and then that makes me so; and she told a strange nurse the other day, that I was the boldest and worst girl ever seen!" And the tears came into her eyes as she spoke, feeling it to be so unjust and unkind. Miss Marston could only answer, "Well, my dear, you know you are often rude to Esther, and her being so is no excuse for you. You must not copy her faults. Perhaps she was not taught when she was a little girl."

Now that Esther had for a time left the nursery, Miss Marston more than ever saw the mischief which had arisen from this want of management and control in Esther's temper, and poor Jane was constantly obliged to call Miss Marston to enforce obedience and quietness. It was all the more to be regretted, because there was so very much to like about Esther, and altogether she was so much to be depended upon.

Half of the time had now passed, and in another fortnight they were to return home. Esther had received a letter from Margaret, written after she arrived at the lodgings. She said she did not feel any better, and did not like the town and the noise; that she longed to be back at Ellerton, but hoped she should see Esther before she went. And Esther began to look anxiously for the day when they should return, and she could see with her own eyes how Margaret was.
