Reminiscences of the survey and cutting out of the Boundary Line between Canada and the United States, from the Spring of 1843 to the close of operations in the field, in the fall of 1845.

[Read before the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec, 17th October, 1855, and published in the Journal of the Society.]

As no account has yet been published of the very interesting survey of the Boundary Line between Canada and the United States, which took place between the years 1842 and 1845, except that by Lieut. Col. Robinson, R. E., published in the "Corps' Papers," which is principally confined to matter purely of a scientific nature; I have been induced to put hastily together, to read for you this evening, a few reminiscences of my own observations of what took place during the period of my employ in the Commission, regretting, at the same time, my inability to obtain Col. Robinson's Report, that I might have embodied with these recollections some of the valuable information therein contained.

The important question of the actual division line that should form the boundary between Canada and the States, for a long period of years was a matter of dispute, and even at one time seriously threatened the peace of the two Powers: therefore, as a preface to these observations, I will endeavour to afford a brief account of the tract of disputed territory which formed for so many years a subject of controversy.
