"For heaven's sake, Madge!" he exclaimed petulantly, "I have neither paralysis nor paresis. And I certainly shall smother."

"Oh, surely," I answered placatingly, turning quickly toward the door that he might not see the irrepressible smile lurking on my lips at the ease with which my mother-in-law's little scheme of feigning illness for her son's sake was succeeding.

Mother Graham's Ruse.
I heard him rise from the couch and lollow me down the halt to my mother-in-law's room. She had undressed and had gone to bed, and I saw with amazement that she'd contrived to make herself look distinctly feverish. Several folds of fiannel were wound around her throat and the room was filled with the fumes of oil and camphor.

"What's the matter, mother?" Dicky and I asked almost simultaneously, as we came into the room.

"It's my throat," she croaked hoarsely.
"It hurts me terribly to swallow, and I ache so all over. I wish, Maragaret, you'd make me a cup of hot tea, and get the hot water bag for my feet, and telephone for some quinine tablets.
"I'm all out of them. I didn't let Katie stay around me because she has to be with the baby, and throat troubles are often catching. But don't worry. I'll probably be all right tomorrow."

I was prepared to pick up the cue we had agreed upon and urge her to have a physician, but Dicky took the words from my moth.

"Tomorrow!" he snorted. "I guess we'll be apt to wait till tomorrow to do something for you. What's Gibson's

"Why, then, does one always think of her as a beauty?" I asked curiously. Dr. L. paused impressively:

"She has the secret. It is so simple that almost any woman can use her since the state of the state of the she shallow, baseless conceit. But every woman should be proud of her body if it is a healthy, well-kept form. Any one can keep her face and form clean and healthy. If it
