Mrs Groverner's Cook

"Gracious—why!" she added in the same instant tone of mingled surprise—just great. That's what took it to be. If you can make anything dress of it, you are cleverer than I am, Mrs. Groverner Rushe's advice.

"Indeed, she said, with dignity, I have never considered myself clever in the matter of dress, but my aim has always been to look as well as my circumstances would permit, and I am perfectly satisfied with the result of my endeavors in that direction."

"Quite right, my dear," said Mrs. Groverner, "quite right, and I'm sure you look very nice indeed, but about the cook, you know—"

"Yes, I know," said Mrs. Groverner, interrupting her pompous husband, "and I think you had better go and see her at once, and tell her that everything is ready for tea, and that she may bring it in."

"Very well, my dear," said Mr. Groverner, rising politely to hand the cook-maid out by his mother's "Now is the time, Groverner, I think, when you find that everything is ready for tea, to ring the bell, and tell the cook to bring it in."

"Oh, no, my dear," said Mrs. Groverner, "not at all necessary. Mr. Groverner, you know, is very particular about his tea, and will be covered with confusion if he finds you are not present to make it for him yourself."

"Quite right
