matter, that he abstained from revealing to her this common sense view of it. Such was Marlan's hypothesis.

Lennox had fixed his wedding day for the last Thursday in October. On the preceding Friday, as he was passing up Broadway, he stopped at Goupil's to see if his order for the framing of the portrait had been fulfilled. The picture had been transferred to the shop, and, when duly framed had been, at Baxter's request and with Lennox's consent, placed for a few days in the exhibition room. Lennox went up to look at it.

The portrait stood on an it. agen...ahan and two dies. The ...m was otherwise empty. As Lennox went toward the picture, the gentleman turned out to be Baxter. Hoproceeded to introduce his friend to his two companions, the younger of whom Lennox recognized at the artist's betrothed. The other, her sister, was a plain, pale woman, with the look of ill health, who had been provided with a seat and made no attempt to tall. Baxter explained that these ladies had arrived from Europe but the day before, and that his first care had been to show them his masterpiece.

"Sarah," said he, "has been praising the model very much to the prejudice of the copt."

would be at least a faithful wife.

With the help of this grim logic Lennox reached the eve of his wedding day. His manner toward Miss Everett during the preceding week had been inveterately tender and kind. He felt that in losing his love she had lost a heavy treasure, and he offered her instead the most unfailing devotion. Marian had questioned him about his lastitude and his preoccupied air, and he had replied that he was a superscript of the second of the he was not very well. On the Wednesday afternoon he mounted his horse and took long ride. He came home toward sunset and was met in the hall by his old house keeper.

and was met in the hall by his old house-keeper.

"Miss Everett's portrait, sir," she said,
"has just been sent home in the most beautiful frame. You gave no directions, and I took the liberty of having it carried into the library. I thought," and the old woman smiled deferentially, "you'd like best to have it in your own room."

Lennox went into the library. The picture was standing on the floor, back to back with a high armchair, and eatching, through the window, the last horizontal rays of the sun. He stood before it a moment, gazing at it with a haggard face.

"Come!" said he, at last, "Marian may be what God has made her; but this detestable creature I can neither love nor respect!"

He looked about him with an angry despair, and his eye fell on a long, keen poniard, given him by a friend who had bought it in the east, and which lay as an ornament on the mantel shelf. He selsed it and thrust it, with barbarous glee, straight into the lovely Fashions in Fans.

The newest gauge fans are painted with large birds, butterflies and bestles, their outline being cut out to form the upper edge of the fan. The messange bird of glorious plumage is applied to a clear white gauge one, and three swallows to black, gray and white gauge fans—for swallows are peculiarly fashionable. The two large bestles are painted in bright red and gold coloring. The lace used comes from Nottingham, Lyons and Calais, and some of the Duchess lace covering the entire mounts, or forming merely a bordering, makes really handsome fans. The painting is done in Paris, and hundreds of white and black ribs are to be seen with flowers, rustic scenes, birds and butterflies, all frost delicately painted in body color. Quite a new introduction on some of these gauge fans is a ribbon edge, half an inch wide, sown on strongly.

Sarah was a tall, black haired girl of 20, with irregular features, a pair of luminous dark cyes, and a smile radiant of white beeth—evidently an excellent person. Since turned to Lomnox with a look of frank sympathy, and swid in a deep, rich voice:

"He must be very beautiful," said Lennox, with his eyes lingering on her own pleasant "These is eyes lingering on her own pleasant "This is very nearly as good," said Lennox, with his eyes lingering on her own pleasant "This is very nearly as good," said Lennox. "You must know her—she must know you."

"I know Mir. Baxter is a genius But what is a peture, at the best? I've seen nothing but pictures for the last two years, and haven't some a single pretty gilr."

The young girl stood looking at the portrain yery evident admiration, and while Baxter alked to the elder lady Lennox bestowed along, covert glance upon his flances. Author—You say the story has merit. Then why do you hesitate about taking it!

Book Publisher—Why, you see, sir, you have not an established reputation. You are not widely known yet. The announcement of a story by you would not of itself be sufficient to make a spontaneous demand for it.

Author—I've fixed all that. I have a friend that is a book reviewer, and as soon asmy story appears he is to brand it at once as a plagiarism from one of Zola's earlier works.
