THE ART OF MATCHMAKING

Problems of Mothers With Marriageable Daughters.

How to marry off a daughter so that the young people should be reasonably happy and not likely to turn up in the divorce courts is a problem in solving which experience does not seem to be everything. To illustrate:

The mother of a beautiful, accomplished, well-off but not wealthy New York debutante sought to marry her to a certain rich young man in her first season. She planned, persistently, patiently, with such success that the marriage took place within a year. After the first handful of rice had been thrown the mother heaved a long sigh of satisfaction, believing that she had done the best in her power to secure her daughter's happiness.

The mother took it hard. Almost she had seem her daughter's happiness, assured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her that desolly declared that she would not have any young man thrown at her head and defined to have her happiness assured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her that desolly declared that she would not have any young man thrown at her head and defined to have her happiness assured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her daughter's happiness, and then her daughter's happiness, assured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her daughter's happiness, and then her daughter's happiness, as sured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her daughter's happiness, and then her daughter's happiness, as sured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her daughter's happiness, and then her daughter's happiness, as sured, as she thought, and there could be no doubt that her first motive was her daughter's happiness, and then her daughter's happiness as sured. As a match-maker the mother had failed for the time being, and her of we have any young man thrown at her had col secure her daughter's happines secure her daughter's happiness.

Now the sequel: Before the honeymoon was over, or rather before the period old fashioned brides and bridegrooms used to allot to the honey-moon, had elapsed, the pair were manifestly indifferent to each other. A year later the young husband was seeking pleasures away from his home, and his unhappy wife was proudly showing a cheerful face to the public. Friends and relatives were astonished, none more so than the were astonished, none more so than the girl's mother, who confidently expected that the trouble would before long right itself. Instead, the wife got a divorce when the subject of marrying off one's and went home to her mother. Now, when the subject of marrying off one's daughters comes up, that particular mother has nothing to say.

Another New York matchmaking mother with the very best intentions toward an only daughter used all her skill, which was considerable, to bring about a marriage between her and a young man of good habits and high social position who was on the road to becoming a rich man. All the young woman's relatives agreed that the match would be ideal, and when the young man showed every evidence of being willing to fall in with the mother's plans they declared that the mother was a lucky woman. The mother thought so herself and was inclined for a time to think highly of her own talents as a match-maker. The daughter took a different view. She took it into her pretty head to snub the young man, to snub him so unmistakably that in high dudgeon he withdrew and promptly transferred his attentions to a girl whom he soon married.

A worldly wise woman who had married off two daughters to their and her swn entire satisfaction said when discussing the prospective marriage of a liece to a man twice her own age and of quite a different bringing up:
"Marriage is the biggest gamble I know of, and even the best match-makers have never discovered a set of rules bound to work the same in every case. A good general rule, I have always found, is this: Provide just the propinquity you want when a girl is very young. Take no chances. Sometimes it takes considerable study and self-denial to do this.
"The mistake my sister made was in settling down last summer for five consecutive weeks in a large hotel where there was a dearth of young men of her daughter's social circle, and no man at all whom she could regard as a possible parti for her daughter. That very fact, I suppose, made her feel secure.
"That a man nearly 40 and of camparatively obscure social position would eatch or try to catch the face, of a girl.

paratively obscure social position would catch or try to catch the fancy of a girl of 18 did not occur to her till near the end of her stay. Then it was to late to do anything. She knows now that five weeks' association at a summer hotel is equal to five months' association in town under ordinary conditions.

in town under ordinary conditions.

"No, the chances are nine to one that the match will not be happy. The two have no friends in common, the disparity in age is too great. I am certain my niece's fiancee would make a splendid husband for some woman, but not for her. He himself, I think, is making a big mistake in marrying my niece.

"The propinquity I believe in is that representing first and foremost persons who have had in the main the same bringing up, whose associations have been similar, whose social point of view is the same. This I always considered first where my own daughters were con-

"His wife and the friends of his mother and sisters and cousins and aunts don't travel in the same orbit at all and the former has not the adaptability to bridge the hiatus and act a new part. The husband, now in the prime of life, is invited here and there without his wife, and he accepts the invitations. "Both he and his wife are miserably unhappy. And the match came about because his parents spent port of a summer at a dull hotel situated near a couple of lively boarding houses.

mer at a dull hotel situated near a couple of lively boarding houses.

"Provided a man has business ability and decent habits a young wife can do a good deal to remedy any lack of knowledge of social customs, manners and observances and of culture he may lack, even though she may suffer in the doing it, and he will be pretty sure to pass muster in any society because of his wife. But a wife lacking some of these attributes is another story. The world is less kind then.

"The first question with wise matchmakers always is how to prevent a misalliance."

makers always is how to prevent a mis-alliance.

"A difference of temperament is ab-solutely essential to the perpetuity of any marriage' is the opinion of the mother of three happily married daugh-ters who ranks high as a matchmaker because none of her daughters was pret-ty or had much money.

mistake when my daughters arrived at marriageable age.
"'A man rated as a millionaire and past his salad days a good bit paid marked attention to my friend's daughter from the day she was introduced to society. This daughter, by the way, was noted for a quarrelsome disposition and a high temper.

"Did the girl's mother oppose the match? Not a bit of it. By a process of reasoning more or less common she thought that marriage would sweeten the man's temper and calm her daughter's imperiousness. The two married and a few years later were divorced after a more than usually tempestuous experience.

"In my daughter's first season she ame very near marrying a boy whom I had known since he and she were in inafores. There was nothing against had known sines to the was nothing against inafores. There was nothing against the youth as a prospective husband except that he had an aimless, unpractical disposition almost a duplicate of that of the girl to whom he was paying attention. He was always at my daughter's and yet he never seemed to be always and yet he never seemed to be always and yet he never seemed to be elbow and yet he never seemed to be making love to her. That he intended to ask her to be his wife I was certain at when was not so certain.
"I determined to break it up if I could but when was not so certain.

"I determined to break it up if I could without hurting the feelings of either. I invited the daughter of a western friend to visit me—a big hustling girl with lots of go in her and plenty of good looks. Before I introduced her to the young man I took care to let the girl know that he was a fine fellow and worth half a million dollars. She did the rest, my daughter in her aimless way looking on without a protest.

"Neither did the young man protest. The western girl woke him up, put life into him. At first at my request he showed her attention, afterward he kept this up without being asked. The two are now married and ideally happy.

"On the other hand a boy with lots of enterprise who as soon as the way was clear began to court my daughter is making her immensely happy. I flatter myself that my matchmaking saved two persons at least from an unsatisfactory marriage.

persons at least from an unsatisfactory narriage. "I know a matchmaker who has, I am sure, prevented at least two marriages which might, I think, have been ideally happy. One of these was between her niece and an Englishman, a manly fel-low, evidently well fitted to make the girl he fancied a good husband. Her aunt was as pleased with him as her niece was. ters along, the Englishman, to her Am-erican ideas, being a little slow and needing her help.

"This is where she made her mistake.

"This is where she made her mistake. An Englishman never needs and assistance whatever with his love affairs. When he sees the girl he fancies he goes straight ahead in his own fashion, which may not be tornado-like, but is sure to get there unless he is opposed. That he seldom goes courting tentatively is my experience of him and I ought to know, as I have an English son-in-law and two English nephews-in-law.

"The American man on the other hand often does go courting tentatively and him too seriously he sometimes quits in self-defence.
