CHAPTER XXVII.

WHEN Roland knocked at the door of Allan Gray, he had forgotten all about the great man he had seen, and all the things they had said. For he had reclied a very curious letter from Allan

Lord love the man, you said you would not object, and now I have come, you say that you had not anticipated—and so on —' said Roland. 'Why, if any two men in England want a great talk together to-night, it is you and I.'

I thought my case was so strong that you would searcley dare to meet me except by density and the wording of my father's will gave you the wording of my father's will gave you.

'You received my letter, sir r.

'You,' said Roland. 'It seems that you are going to dispute my succession to Stretton Castle. I can't ask you on what what grounds, because, don't you see, that would be unfair and ungentlemanly on my part. I can only say that, from all I have eyer heard of you trom Reddy, you are much fitter to have it than I am. I have the will to do good, and you have the way. Why on earth should we talk about the matter?'

'I wished to talk business,' said Allan Gray, utterly puzzied.

'What on earth would become of the lawyers if we talked our own business over,' said Roland. 'Here am I, gazetted on next Teesday. My dear mu, how and very glorious agreer before you, would you want to talk on business which had much better be left to your lawyer?'

BLAKE FOR BRUCE.

We were glad, the other night, to see a telegram from Edward Blake, Esq., an-numering his intention to come out for telegram from Edward Blake, Eq., announcing his intention to come out for South Bruce. That is the right answer to the defiant announcements of the Government organs that he "dare" not attempt it. He dares to attempt it, and we dare to predict that he will comptetely put to route Colonel Sprott of "dead horse" celebrity though, he is supposed to be "big on the fight." 0 100
