Peace!

The war is over. It has ended in the only manner in which it could end, in which the Allies would permit it to end—in the consummation of the vows solemnly taken by them in the terrible days of its beginning, in the overwhelming victory of their arms, the complete triumph of their righteous cause. This day will be remembered down the ages, the greatest save one in all the history of mankind; it will shine forever like a star, its name and fame an echo and a light to all eternity. The dawn of victory and peace, which has been brightening in the sky since that darkest hour which gave it birth, has at last burst with sudden and overpowering splendour into the glorious light of Day.

For there are millions whose eyes indeed that light will overpower for a time. The end of so much and so heroic suffering cannot be felt and understood at once. He would be inspired indeed who could express the least of the thoughts and feelings that possess men's minds and hearts at this moment. Yet first and chief among them, we know, is that of thankfulness, too deep, too sincere, too reverent for the light show of rejoicing and exultation. In the moment of victory our thoughts must turn in gratitude and praise to Him that giveth us the victory; afterwards to those strong arms and brave hearts, too many of them forever still, who were His instruments.

We here in this Dominion, one in that great Empire whose part in the struggle is being at last understood and acclaimed by its generous rivals, can rightly take our share of pride in the glory of its achievements, in the tale that unfolds itself to our eyes in retrospect of the four long years of war. Our soldiers stand, as they have so often stood, in the van of the British army. They stood there and lent their strength to that great blow which has been called the greatest feat of arms of all the war, when that army anticipated gloriously the work destined to the weary months of next winter's campaign; when Haig's men in one wonderful week drove clean through the Hindenburg line and dealt Germany the knockout blow to which the succeeding days have been but the counting-out. It was the fine close of a fine record, and paid, alas! in the dear price which Britain has never stinted. And Britons the world over may be forgiven if, at a time when so many memories come crowding upon them, they hold this one freshest in their minds.

For the rest, Great Britain stands to-day with her great-hearted Allies on the threshold of a new era. May they bring to the mighty task that lies before them the same unity, the same high purpose, the same adherence to the principles of righteousness and justice which have guided them through the performance up to the fulfillment of that which they have put forever behind them.

The noon of this day saw, in the signing of the Peace terms, the greatest event in history since the Crucifixion. Humanity, once again redeemed, throws off the shackles forged by centuries of crime and stands free limbed and strong, claiming its place in the Sun, the beautiful thing that God looked on and said "This good!" Epidemic Influenza.

A meeting of medical practitioners was held on Saturday night to consider the advisability of relaxing the quarantine regulations in the city. While all agreed that the epidemic is abating very satisfactorily, it was unanimously decided that it would not be safe at the present juncture to relax the precautions taken in the slightest degree.

In looking back upon the epidemic, from figures furnished by Mr. Doye, I find that there were, during the month of October, 62 deaths from influenza and pneumonia which may be reasonably coupled with the influenza. Of these 62 deaths 49 were below 30 years of age, and the average age of those who died was 24 years—an age when vitality is at its maximum, proving the virulence of the infection.

The highest mortality of any day during the month was reached on the 24th when nine deaths occurred; and, during that week, from Monday, October 28th, there were twenty-eight deaths.

Overland 90 Model

SERVES IN EMERGENCY.

The old adage that "Necessity is the mother of invention" is evidently working full force wherever occasion calls for unusual ingenuity.

A recent example was the use made of an Overland Model 90 delivery car to run a modern printing establishment. While this is not included under the ordinary accomplishments of motor cars nor advocated by the Overland Company, yet it was a case of necessary power and the "90" did the trick.

Recent drought caused the temporary shut-down of the hydro-electric plant which supplied Atlanta industries with power. All industries which were dependent upon this supply had to face the alternative of installing other temporary power supply or discontinue business.

The Foote and Davis Company of Atlanta, conceived the idea of installing a motor car to pull their electric generator and the Model 90 Overland was quickly installed and went to work. For six weeks it served to keep this large printing establishment going full force and naturally the company appreciates this emergency service which successfully lifted them over a difficult period.

Light Badly Needed.

The residents of Waterford Bridge Road, extending from Riverhead in a few hundred yards, are complaining that there is no light there, and that one is badly needed. Someone ago this matter was brought up before the Municipal Council, and the money to pay expenses of erecting a light there voted. We have been on this section of the road and can vouch for the absolute need for a light.
