Lord Cecil's Dilemma —OR— The Picnic —in— Woodall Forest

CHAPTER XI.

Gardner watched Lady Stanhope with a species of fascination. In some way she seemed to recall some one whom he had known, and she, in turn, found herself listening eagerly to the music of his eloquent voice.

After dinner Flossie played and sung to the gentlemen, while Lord Cecil moodily gnawed at the ends of his mustache, and the young lawyer listened to be in excellent spirits through the engagement of her eldest daughter to Sir Charles Hastings; still she was a little dubious concerning the young lady's remarks about Lord Cecil.

Seizing the first opportunity which ordinary civility permitted, Stanhope escaped from the drawing-room and took Gardner with him.

"It's a relief to get away from that cant," he said. "Lady Craythorne makes me sick. I don't mind Flossie, poor little thing, only she does make it so unpleasant to the world when she's in love with a fellow. Come into my snugery and we'll smoke."

He produced several brands of fine cigars, and for a while they puffed in silence.

"We'll run over to Swinford Abbey to-morrow," he said at last. "The earl has been ill for some time, but there are hopes now that he will soon recover. I want you to comfort Lady Gladys, if you can. She is bearing her troubles like a Trojan; and, by Jove, this affair of Hastings' will be a fresh blow, for she thinks all the world of him."

Gardner looked at his companion through the wreaths of smoke that curled between them.

"Stanhope," he said, suddenly. "I think that I can trust you. Let me tell you that you are like, and yet unlike, the Stanhope of old. You have lost much of the objectionable arrogance that I remember, and it surprises me that I consented to be your adviser. I am glad now that I came, and I will work heart and soul for you if need be."

"I am much obliged to you," was the somewhat surly rejoinder. "I know that I haven't been particularly considerate of other people's feelings; it never was one of my distinguishing traits, and, if I have altered for the better, it is simply owing to impending adversity. But I am not going to talk business until I have consulted with Lady Gladys. I nearly forced her into a marriage, the thought of which she detested, merely to humor my blind stubbornness, and now I'm out of it, partly because I'm sorry for her, and partly because I mean to be quits with somebody you'll know hereafter!"

A vindictive gleam shot into his eyes, and for a space the barrister felt a trifle unplused.

"Of course," he observed, "I can offer no opinion until I am relieved of this mystery. I will say, though, that I have no belief in this engagement of Sir Charles. I left him but a few days since, speechless. He met with a shooting accident, and was too weak to move, too feverish to recognize one."

Stanhope whistled. "I knew nothing of this. I only hope that it is not true, for Lady Gladys' sake. I am on the stool of penitence, and it is one of my wishes that these two come together again."

"And yet, Ada Craythorne is not the girl to spread a baseless report of that kind," Gardner said, reflectively. "She is strong-willed, passionate, a little unscrupulous, where her interests are at stake, but too proud to circulate stories of that kind, and then have to face a humiliating denial."

"She's a fine girl," remarked Lord Cecil. "And no fellow can help admiring her."

Gardner had to admit this. He could not help thinking about her, and called himself a fool for it. He had begun by distrusting her, he had determined to expose her, but now he was resolved to shield her.

LADY IRIS' MISTAKE;

—or the—

Hero of 'Surata'

CHAPTER I.

The motto of the family was, "Held with honor." The crest, chosen by the same king who had created the earldom, was a lion with a white lily on a blue shield. In olden times the cry of "The lion and the lily!" had scattered the foe and made bolder the hearts of friends.

All round Chandos there still remained the trace of royal residence. The forest where the stately deer browsed was called the King's Forest, and the nearest town was Kingsdene. The principal rooms in the mansion, which were magnificently decorated, opened upon a noble entrance-hall, in which was a broad oak staircase with superbly-carved banisters, leading to a picture-gallery that had no equal in the country. The great staircase and the hall were flecked with rich color, for the large windows were fitted with stained glass. Over the grand entrance, above the large windows, and round the pillars was the motto—"Held with honor!" On the great iron gates over the hall door, carved on the rich marble mantel pieces, over the doors of the principal rooms, were the lion and the white lily on a shield.

Mrs. Bellow had been accustomed to magnificent houses; but the splendor of this in its ancestral glory startled her. Her duties suddenly assumed a solemn aspect; she was to be the guide and friend of the heiress of this grand old place. As she walked up and down the broad terraces she wondered what Lady Iris would be like, and how she would get on with her.

Mrs. Bellow herself was fair and comely, she was sensible, calm, and judicious, and was well suited for the position she was about to occupy. She was dressed with great care and elegance. First impressions, she knew, were everything, and she wished to impress Lady Iris most favorably.

Half an hour after she was talking to a tall slender young beauty, who carried herself with the utmost grace and ease—a girl with a face that was peerless in its dainty high-bred loveliness, and Mrs. Bellow was saying to her—

"You are wonderfully like the Faynes. Do you know the old rhyme about the Ladies Fayne?"

"No, I have never heard!" replied the girl, interested at once.

"It is an old saying. I used to hear my mother sing it; she was a Fayne. This is it—

"All the Faynes are fair of face,
All the Faynes are proud and cold—
They their name with honor hold!"

"The last line is the only one I care for," said Lady Iris. "The others are full of flattery."

"Do you think it flattery to be called 'proud and cold'?" asked Mrs. Bellow.

"Yes, decidedly I do. I like cold people, and I like proud people. Above all, I like people who hold their names in honor, as we Faynes do."

And that little conversation gave the anxious chaperon some faint idea of the character of Lady Iris.
