On a rainy morning in October, 1914, the writer in company with a few other citizens said good-bye to a small company of brave boys, who were leaving for the front. Along with them was Charles Ellworthy, who had been in the employ of Mrs. David Laur, and a more dejected youth we never saw. Charlie had offered his services, but was rejected on account of his diminutive stature. He applied at London, Guelph and Toronto in turn, and offered his services in any capacity with the same result. He was determined to do his "bit" however, and paid his own passage to England and finally got in the ranks. On October 14th last, he received a fatal wound in France and died before he reached the hospital. Charlie was a sunny tempered young fellow and a great favorite with all his acquaintances. His love of country, and keen sense of duty, deserved a better fate, and the sudden ending of this bright young life will cast a gloom over this community.
