"Then we will not say it at all," he sured, heartily, as his big hand seemed a swallow up Fay's little soft fingers. will wish you God-spead instead, Lady banond. I dare say your cousin, Mr. attingdon, will be good enough to let us sow how you are if he ever passes the gange. "To be sure I will," was Erle's reply to its, and then he deposited Fay in her gener of the carriage and took his place beside her. Both of them leaned forward for a parting look at the brother and sister at they stood together in the porch. "What a grand-looking pair they are," observed Erle, as they turned into the read; "don't you think Miss Ferrers is a sety handsome woman, Fay? I admire air immensely."

and Erle was so peremptory with me."
"Well, well, you need not ory about it," beerved her husband impatiently; "you word to you; I have a right to be displeased limy wife goes against my wishes."

"I am very sorry," she answered, neekly, trying to keep back those troublement tears; "please do not be so angry, llugh, you know I care for nothing but to please you, and—and I don't feel quite well, and your voice is so loud."
"Very well, then, I will take myself off," in a rather huffy tone, but he relented at the sight of her pale little face, and some of his bad humor evaporated. "The fact is, you are such a child that you don't know how to take care of yourself," he toutinued, sitting down by her, and letting her rest comfortably against him. "You will do yourself a mischief some day, Fay, I shall get Doctor Martins to come up and tee your foot, and then, perhaps, he will import a learner."

shall get Doctor Martins to come up and tee your foot, and then, perhaps, he will give you a lecture."

"Oh, no," she returned, charmed at this hange of tone, for his anger had frightened ter; "there is no need for that, dear, it is may a sprained ankle, and Miss Ferrers as bandaged is so beautifully, a day or liw's rest will put it all right."

"But all the same, I should like to have bottor Martin's opinion," he answered, quickly. "I am afraid you must have found it very awkard, Fay, being cast on the compassion of strangers."

"Oh, no, indeed," was the eager answer; "they were so good and kind to me, Hugh; they were so good and kind to me, Hugh; they were so good and kind to me, Hugh; they were so good and kind to me, Hugh; they were so good and kind to me, Hugh; they welcomed me just as though I were an ald friend. I was a little faint at first, my foot hurt me so; but when I opened my tyes, I found myself in such a lovely old from, on such an easy couch, and Miss ferrers gave me some wine, and actually hathed my foot end bound it up herself."

"What sort of a room was it, Wee Wiffer?"

Fay thought there was something odd in the rest husband; but if she is weak and nervous and uses Carter's Irutle Liver will and nervous and nervous and uses Carter's Irutle Liver will and nervous and uses Carter's Irutles the store will and nervous and uses Carter's Irutles to the will and nervous and uses Carter's Irutles the store will allive to have differe

Wife?"
Fay thought there was something odd in ser husband's voice, but she had her head in his shoulder, and could not see his face, the winter dusk was creeping over the toom, and only the fire-light illumined it. Hugh felt himself safe to put that question, but he could not quite control his voice.
"Oh, it was Miss Ferrers' morning-room, she told me so, and it had a bay window with a .cushioned seat overlooking the garden. Oh, how lovely Miss Ferrers is, Hugh. I have never seen any one like her, never. I am sure she is as sweet and good as an angel, only I wish she did not look so sad, there were tears in her eyes once when we were talking; let me see, what were we talking about? oh, about those cottages you are building, she did look so interested—did you s. eak, dear?"

"No—go on," he said huskily; but if only Fay could have seen his face.

"I feel I should love her so if I could only see more of her. I could not help kissing her when I came away, but she did not seem at all surprised. Mr. Ferrers wished me God-speed in such a nice way, tbo. Oh, they are dear people; I do wish you would let me know them, Hugh."

"My dear child, it is impossible," but Hugh spoke fast and nervously; "have I not already explained to you that there can be no intimacy between Redmond Hall and the Grange. When old friends quarrel as we have, it is a fatal blow to all friendshin."

"You were old friends, then?" in some shrprise, for he had never said as much to her before.

"Yes," he returned, reluctantly, for he had not meant to admit this fact.

"You war old friends, then? it is not like you to do a misunderstanding, surely if to could be put right." But he silenced her somewhat haughtily.

"This is my affair, Fay—it is not like you to go against my wishes in this way; what can a child like you know about it?

I should have thought a wine would have been willing to be guided by her husband, but you seem to think you know about it?
