

becoming increasingly one-dimensional if it depends on a single data source (the World Bank), which will be reproduced ad infinitum by a large number of distribution channels. UNESCO must not buy the World Bank's argument that locally collected data is not reliable, not relevant to comparisons, and expensive to obtain.

UNESCO must promote the development of local research capacities; otherwise, how can we proceed to the analysis and criticism necessary to the operation of civil society (on which we count more and more)?
