

3. This latter word the Indians found it difficult to pronounce. It is always difficult for the people of one country to pronounce correctly the language of another country; and when the Indians attempted to pronounce the word English, they could get no nearer to it than to call it Yang-hees.

4. A short time before the English began the settlement of New-England, a party of Dutch came over from Holland and began a settlement in New-York. They soon heard of the arrival of the English, and were much displeased. They wished the whole country to themselves. Hence, they became quite unfriendly to their new neighbours; affected to despise them, and did many things which were calculated to injure them. At several different times they secretly sowed the Indians against them, and when the latter called the English Yang-hees, the Dutch, by way of