MINIATURE RAIN CAUSED BY INSECTS
Tiny Bugs Suck Sap From Leaves—Weather Expert's Explanation Solves Mystery of Ten-Foot Area "Rainfall."
Washington, October 18.—Do not blame meteorology for the ten-foot square "rainfall" that has been heralded from Alexandria, Va., near here, Entomology explains it. Proferring at the fanciful explanations and the mystery that has been known about this phenomenon, Dr. W. J. Humphreys, professor of meteorological physics of the United States Weather Bureau, declares that plant lice produce the supposed "rain."
These insects are found on sycamore and other trees by the thousands. They are little brown mites, three-sixteenths of an inch long, which suck the sap from the leaves and squirt it out of their bodies. This secretion is the liquid that appears to be rain. Dr. Humphreys says there are dozens of trees in Washington that are producing the same kind of "rain." Several of these are in Pennsylvania Avenue and secrete so much of the sticky moisture that pedestrians avoid passing under their branches.
The liquid produced by plant lice is of a honey dew consistency and stays on the pavement or ground much longer than would the same amount of rain water. It has been suggested that something of this sort made the famous maana of the Israelites in their flight through the wilderness from Egypt.

It is also declared absurd to explain the Alexandria "rain" and the exuding of moisture from a tree itself. Although there is a tree in South America which is said to do something of the kind, none of the trees of the Virginia city are of this species.
Rain seldom falls in a ground-wetting shower over an area of less than one square mile, although a few drops may fall over a much smaller area, says Dr. Humphreys.
