HON. GEORGE E. FOSTER'S WAS FINEST SPEECH HEF OPENING AT BIRMINGHAM'S BIG BANQUET

(Birmingham Gazette and Express,
July 15.)

The dinner at the council house last evening given by the lord mayor of Birmingham (Alderman Bowdler) to the representatives of the Dominion Parliaments, was, for its post-prandial oratory, unique. The lord mayor, who has a wonderful instinct for doing the right thing in the right way, made a notable departure in proposing the King. He started off by addressing the company as "Britons." It is a word we in this country do not like. It is not English. It is of Colonial origin, and in our judgment not so expressive as "Britons." Had his lordship said "Britons All" it might possibly have been more acceptable to the purists at home, but the distinction would have been lost. He referred to our Colonial cousins. After all, the word "Britisher" is a doubtful word though it be—current throughout the Empire. He began his remarks as "Britisher," and we thought we were in a law suit. In words as in manners, is a law unto itself. Well, his lordship's remarks were not "Britisher," and we thought we were in a law suit. In words as in manners, is a law unto itself. Well, his lordship's remarks were not "Britisher," and we thought we were in a law suit.

A Thrilling Speech.

Oratory in these days is more or less a lost art. We have no orators now, with the exception of Lord Rosebery; and so the speech of the evening—that of the Hon. G. E. Foster, M. P., L.L.D., Canada—came as a great surprise. He began his remarks as "Britisher," and we thought we were in a law suit. In words as in manners, is a law unto itself. Well, his lordship's remarks were not "Britisher," and we thought we were in a law suit.

Opened Hearts and Homes.

In opening a banquet must give some advice, but what advice was he to give the Parliaments of the United Kingdom at this critical moment in history he did not know. (Laughter.) The Parliaments of the United Kingdom had been their hosts in this beautiful, compact, rich country—rich not only in material possessions, but in its traditions, its history, its literature, the records of its adventures and enterprise. (Applause.) For this present visit they were indebted to the Lords and Commons, who made up the Parliaments of the United Kingdom. What happy genius first put it into their heads to carry out such an idea he did not know, but he thought his friend Mr. Steel-Maitland had something to do with that, and he thought another member of Parliament present in the House of Commons, who made up the Parliaments of the United Kingdom.

ed, "have the advantage of having a King—one King over every Dominion belonging to our Empire, stretched from us, separated by seas, but united in heart. The unifying word in all these more or less geographically detached Empires is our King." (Applause.)

Mr. Foster's Address.

The toast of "The Parliaments of the United Kingdom" was proposed by the Hon. G. E. Foster, M. P. (Canada). He observed that to a company from overseas coming to the city of Birmingham for any function whatever, there was one name and one memory which would be present to everyone—the name and memory of the deeds of one of the greatest citizens of this country, and one of the splendid pioneers of Empire. (Hear, hear.) If they asked for his monument, they might look round and see it. Nobly though it was emblazoned within the precincts of this city, if they wanted to see the monument in greater relief, let them search the annals of the United Kingdom, read the splendid deeds of Empire. (Hear, hear.) If they asked for his monument, they might look round and see it. Nobly though it was emblazoned within the precincts of this city, if they wanted to see the monument in greater relief, let them search the annals of the United Kingdom, read the splendid deeds of Empire. (Hear, hear.)

Thoughts of Empire.

Further than that, they would not expect him to reveal the secrets of the past. (Laughter.) But their thoughts that night travelled to the wider fields of Empire represented there in that great gathering. Mr. Foster had spoken of what the English visitors had learnt in their visit to this country. He (Mr. Chamberlain) would suppose that he was in the hands of those who first conceived the thought, and the invitation which brought them here was the desire that they who were engaged in the work of the widely-scattered British Dominions should become better acquainted, and should like each other better, which could only be brought about by a closer acquaintance, and that they should understand one another better, which was more important, although, perhaps, more difficult, so that when they were once again scattered and out of immediate touch their thoughts should travel by a sort of wireless telegraphy, and the same sentiments should float around the globe wherever the British flag flew. (Applause.)

of them all. He could not but feel that there was something a little pathetic in the fact that the senior member for the city of Birmingham and the late colonial secretary, whose name was a household word far beyond its limits, should not have been there himself to give a welcome to their brethren from the overseas. (Hear, hear.) He (the speaker) was touched and grateful for the words which Mr. Foster spoke of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. His father charged him that morning to say how much he and Mrs. Chamberlain regretted not being able to take part in the welcome to Birmingham or to show them any hospitality in the city. But his father's thoughts were with them that night, and would find an echo in the speech which Mr. Foster had just made.

Replying to the toast, Austen Chamberlain said he shared Mr. Foster's hope that that happy thought of an Informal Parliamentary Congress of the Empire might sometimes be realized. But of our own United Kingdom Parliament he would only say on that occasion that he hoped that when the visitors from overseas again came to the land, they would still find Commons and Lords to entertain them—(laughter and applause)—and that in the meantime he might feel that they set up by what he heard from one of the sister Parliaments, Australia. They had there a nine months' recess, and he thought we in this country would not be so long in waiting, and applause. Here they had had it did not know how many months of session, while the months, even the weeks, had been singularly rare of recent years. (Laughter.) But, after all, on an occasion like that, it was not the domestic troubles that filled their thoughts. They would solve themselves, or the members of the Parliament would solve them for better or for worse, to their liking or disliking—(laughter)—one way or another. (Laughter.)

Further than that, they would not expect him to reveal the secrets of the past.
