HOME GOOD FABLES IN SLANG

George Ade Points Out Several Morals.

Robbie Needs No Help and Little Gobble Is Only Ordinary—Husband Was No Strategist.

After that the mother never spoke to him again. He could prove by Huxley that the grunting sounds and the facial grimaces were not indications of an early intelligence bestirring itself, but were caused by wind on the tummy.

In company one evening a beaming papa and mamma were handling a small, squashy one around from one guest to another and listening to the heartfelt declarations of rapture. They called the mean man's attention to the fact that the darling was willing to go to any stranger, and asked him if he did not consider it unprecedented.

By way of reply he brought out some notes from scientific works, proving that a small child always shows a discriminating affection and distrust for unfamiliar faces, unless its faculties are stunted. He said the records would show that a child who would warm up to any caller usually develops into an easy mark for life insurance agents and confidence men.

He knew just when the first tooth ought to be through the gum, and what age a tot should manage to stand by holding on to a chair, and how soon it ought to begin to speak pieces and sing "Little Birdy in the Tree."

It gave him cruel joy to prove to parents that one baby was about the same as another and that all the star performances of little starchy-kitchy pet had been duplicated at least a million times in other nurseries.

By following these cold-blooded tactics he protected the general public from a common variety of bore, but when the mothers got together of an afternoon he was read out of decent society and the time came when he never received an invitation to dinner.

Moral: Pretend to be interested and pleased. Once there was a husband who was still deeply in love with his wife, although she was tired of seeing him around the house. She used to have company as often as possible, so as to have someone else to talk to, and when he was away from home she used to send him frequent wires assuring him that everything was running along smoothly and not to hurry back.

He realized that they were drifting apart and he wondered if there was not some way of regaining her affection and causing her to like him just as well as she had before she found out all about him.

One evening at a continuous show he saw a clever little sketch in which a husband won back his wife by pretending to make a warm species of love to another woman, thereby arousing the jealousy of the wife.

On the stage the husband's little scheme worked out without a kink or a break, and led up to a reconciliation that was worth the price of admission. This husband decided to try the same cure. So from that day he began to pay marked attention to other women, so that his wife could not fail to notice what he was up to.

So from that day he began to pay marked attention to other women, so that his wife could not fail to notice what he was up to.

As soon as she saw him cutting up with other women and apparently preferring their society to that of his wife, she said to herself: "I have stood for this crustacean going on three years because I thought if I gave him the shake he might do something desperate. I thought that I was the only one he cared for, and that if I set him into the cold street, his heart strings would snap. His present conduct indicates that he is fond of a few others, so that makes it easy for me. Tomorrow we dissolve partnership."

And she gave him his walking papers. Moral: The ordinary husband never was intended for strategy. GEORGE ADE.
