LORD MORDEN'S DAUGHTER THE TRAGEDY OF THE CEDARS.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The wound in his head began to throb violently with the excitement, and he had to acknowledge that he was much weaker than he had imagined, for the smallest exertion sent him into a fever heat. The trouble that exercised him most was the question of his absence, of his seeming desertion, upon Dora, and he wondered if Fairfax had yet told her of the doubt that rested upon the legality of their marriage. "What is the value of this idle speculation?" he thought at last. "Rather should I thank Heaven for my providential escape from a miserable fate—the fate of a death by misadventure, and trust that the same kind Power has taken care of my darling, too."

The cab pulled up at Frank Rogers' home in due course, and Locksley alighted, his heart leaping to his throat. "Wait for me," he said to the driver, and then moved to the door, with that appeared to be the leaden feet, while a profuse perspiration burst out all over him. "The rang the bell, and when Mrs. Rogers answered the door, she nearly collapsed with astonishment and fright. "Mr. Locksley!" she cried. "It is I," smiled Edmund. "I want to rest a while, and I hope that Frank is in."

Mrs. Rogers was speechless for a minute. "And you are not dead, after all," she said at last. "And not run away, either. My boy said that you would come back again—he has declared it all along; and do you know, sir, that your dear wife, she—"

"Well," demanded Locksley, in terror. "She would just have waited and fate. If the lady will leave us alone, I will endeavor to explain." Mrs. Rogers withdrew, and now that the stranger was standing, Locksley saw that he was a grandly-proportioned man, a little beyond middle life, with a handsome, bronzed face, almost covered with a thick beard and whiskers, while a heavy mustache entirely hid his mouth. His tones were deep, musical, and polished, and in his gray eyes was a kindly light. Locksley dropped into a chair, saying: "Excuse me, sir; I am recovering from a recent severe illness, and the slightest exertion overcomes me." The stranger resumed his seat, then went on: "I am answering an advertisement which has been pretty freely circulated. "Yes?" "The advertiser is Mr. Frank Rogers. Perhaps you understand me now?"

"No, I must confess that I do not," said Locksley, and the old gentleman looked disappointed. He handed a newspaper, with a marked paragraph, to Edmund, observing: "Of course, you know nothing of the affair; you can have no interest in it, but your name—the name of Locksley, led me to believe that you—"

He paused, for Edmund was reading the advertisement with astonishment. "It is signed Dora," he said. "Yes, this is Frank's work. I left the matter entirely to his discretion." "But for that little word, Dora," sighed the stranger, "I should never have answered the notice—should never have heeded it."

He was almost overcome by emotion, and turned his face to the window; then he went on, with feverish intensity: "And now, Mr. Locksley, can you tell me if this is no ruse—can you tell me if there is such a person as Dora? My tortures for the last three days have been worse than those of Tantalus! You must know, or you would not be so cruel!"

He broke down again, and Edmund whispered, eagerly: "You are Dora's father—you are the missing Lord Morden!" "I am! Tell me that this is not another illusion! Young man, I have long given up all dreams of happiness, of even quiet contentment in this life. If you have awakened false hopes, it would have been kinder to put a knife into my heart. I lost my wife—twenty years since through a boyish folly; I killed her as surely as man ever broke woman's heart. We had two sweet children, and I was told that both were dead. I have seen their graves at the churchyard in Deal; I have had stones engraved to their memory. I trusted a friend, who betrayed me, but I had no use for my money—for even my identity, and saw hope only in the grave. I have let him enjoy my wealth without interruption—the wealth he has stolen."

"No, no!" interrupted Edmund. "My father is the most miserable of men. A week since he resolved to restore every penny, with the accumulated interest. I will swear that he knew not of the existence of your daughter. Her grandfather so hated you that he deceived everybody."

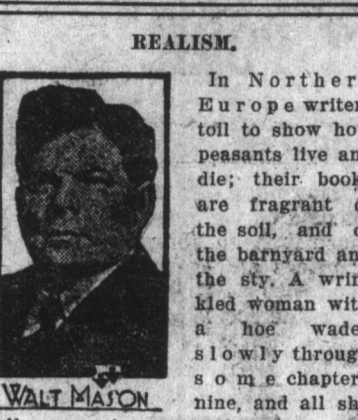

"Then she lives!" Dord Morden was almost hysterical. "Lives, and is my wife! Do you wonder at my joy? The last barrier is removed! Upon the very day that we were married, my father confessed his crime to me, and the horror of it nearly drove me mad." "The men clasped each other's hands and then Locksley related the whole of his interesting story in detail, while the other listened in wonderment. "And now," concluded Edmund, "I shall fly to my waiting wife—there is nothing between us!"

"I will go with you," Lord Morden announced. "I will go with you, and you shall break the news to Dora." He softly murmured the loved name. "Do you know, Edmund, that I am almost taken back to the happy days of my youth? I half-expect to meet my beautiful wife again—Dora's sainted mother—who died, believing that I had deceived her. Just Heaven, this is the bitterest blow of all!" He brushed the tears from his eyes and went on:

REALISM.
In Northern Europe writers toil to show how peasants live and die; their books are fragrant of the soil, and of the barnyard and the sty. A wrinkled woman with a hoe wades slowly through a sowing machine, and all she takes in her hand and greets that don't take in their sign. The wrinkled crone has seven sons, tall men with sandbars in their hair, and they are always packing tons of fettle burdens here and there. And everything they do is vain, no harvests follow when they sow, their mules are misred down in the lane, their cows go dry, their pigs won't grow. Their lives don't know a lighter side, disaster frustrates all they do; a man may marry, but his bride turns out next day to be a shrew. A girl may marry, but the gent who leads her to the village Kirk, soon shows he cannot make a cent, although his life is made of work. And these dreary people trail through turgid pages, and and gray; the only thing they do is fall, and do it in a dismal way. There is no humor in these mope, and if you take one in your hand, and read it in such ingenious ways you will not have a sprightly hour, unless you close our Realism lives, fruit in sorrow stark and done that haunts the peasants and their wives. Yet many soulful readers rise proclaiming that these books are great; the authors draw the Nobel prize, and take in roubles by the crate. All sorts of people are required to make this world, this tearful vale; and as for me I can't be hired to read sad books that make me wail.

What Sea Breezes Are
When air becomes warm it expands, gets lighter, and rises, which fresh, colder air blows in and takes its place. That is why there is usually a breeze at the seaside.
The land grows warm in the sunshine, while the sea remains practically cool, so there is generally a flow of cooler air from the sea taking the place of the warm air rising from the land.
These differences of temperature occur all over the world. Big areas of land and water become unequally hot and make the layers of air above them unequal in temperature, and therefore different in pressure.

Tired Nerves

Mrs. E. R. Walsh, R.R. No. 2, Nawan, Ont., writes:—"Dr. Chase's Nerve Food saved me from a nervous breakdown. I had been nervous, could not sleep and was always tired. The Nerve Food built me up and made me feel like a different person."

MODERN life brings a terrible strain on woman's delicate nervous system. The continuous whirl of social life, charitable and church work, together with all the cares of home and family entail a burden that the nerves cannot bear. Sooner or later physical bankruptcy must come and the inevitable break-down.

Why not guard against this by taking a reasonable amount of rest and building up health and strength with the use of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food?

This great restorative has long since proven its merits as the most effective means of building up the exhausted nervous system.
