A LARGE AUDIENCE

Eminent Actor Appeared As the Old Potter in "The Middleman" at the Grand.

"The Middleman," Henry Arthur Jones' play, which Mr. E. S. Willard has for some years made famous, was presented for the first time in the new Grand Opera House by the favorite actor last night. "The Middleman" has been given on previous occasions in London, its last presentation taking place some years ago in the old Grand. Though anything in which Willard appears is sure to please, he might easily have chosen from his repertoire a play which would have been more to the liking of a great many Londoners than was "The Middleman." For instance. had he played "David Garrick" or "Tom Pinch," he would have fallen in with the ideas of quite a number of theatergoers who have seen him on several occasions in "The Middleman" naturally prefer to see him in different

Mr. Willard's superb reading of the part of Cyrus Blenkarn, the inventor, last night charmed the very large and fashionable audience. His mimicry and his portrayal of the different moods of the half-distracted, old man, who believes his daughter has dis graced him, were above criticism, his outbursts of passion and vengeful uterances being simply splendid. The Willard the audience saw last night is the Willard of old, refined, dignified, horough in his interpretations.

He was supported by Miss Alice Lonnon, as Mary, his daughter, who was also seen here with Mr. Willard three years ago as Honoria in "The Cardinal." Miss Lonnon is a charming actress, and her capable acting worked up remendous sympathy for the wronged daughter of the old potter. Miss Marian Linden, as her sister, Nancy interpreted a part quite opposed to that of Miss Lonnon, and she proved herself a therough actress. Mr. Ernest Stalard, as Jesse Pegg, in his lovemaking with Nancy, provided the humor which tempers the play, and in his impersonation of the ardent, present-giving lover, he left nothing to be desired, Mr. Wm.
