McKeesport Doctor Found Dead On Tracks. Peculiar Circumstances.

[Canadian Press.]

Pittsburg, Pa., May 12 .- What the authorities of Allegheny County believe was a murder and robbery was uncovered early today, when the body of Dr. George W. Goetz, aged 28, of McKeesport, was found on the railroad tracks, near Hawkins station. The head was crushed in and both feet had been cut off. Becaus no blood was found where the feet had authorities believe Dr. Goetz was murdered and robbed and that the body was then thrown on the tracks to hide the crime. The finding of the physician's empty wallet near the body strengthened

For year I strained my corsets trying to hide the rolls of fat on my hips and abdomen; it seemed as if it had accumulated on just the two places that I most wanted to be thin. Everything that I tried failed to take off the horrible fat where it showed. But thanks to a lady friend who had studied herboristeric, I learned the secret of a harmless plan which enabled me to rub away with ease.

If she was there—she must be there—she was there—he would not be able to see her upless she was learning organist the willing. was there—ne would not be able to see her unless she was leaning against the railing. She was resting in the shelter of the cabin. She must be. She had swum in this cove all summer by herself, and nothing had happened. Cramps? No, no, no! She never had cramps, and if she did have them she would have been washed ashore. them, she would have been washed ashore long before. Not if caught in the under-tow and swept out to sea. But she didn't have cramps. She didn't. Would he never get there! He reached the sloop at last and clambered on board. It was empty, deserted, with its bare masts and tightly-fastened, nailed-up cabin. She wasn't there, yet on the beach were her cloak and slippers.

For a moment it seemed impossible to grasp the fact that he was alone on the deck. Dull with despair, his face white, he turned to scan the rocks on either side he turned to scan the rocks on either side of the cove, remembering the day she had laughed at him from their shelter But no Lorelei hailed him now from their foam-covered crags A seaguli wheeled by with its hoarse cry and the bell-buoy seemed to moan in anguish, but no gay voice called to him out of the drifting fog. no slender figure, in clinging, dripping suit, waved to him from either headland. Yet there were her slippers and cloak in Yet there were her slippers and cloak in a forlorn little pile on the beach, irrefutable witnesses that she had gone in swimming. Maybe she had seen Holmes coming and had wandered back into the woods to wait until he left. But if she had she would have snatched up her slippers at least and put them on. She always left them as near the water's edge as she dared so she could get them as soon as dared, so she could get them as soon as possible, for even the stones and sticks on the beach hurt her feet. Besides, Holmes would have waited for his name-Holmes would have waited for his name-sake, if he had come. Nevertheless, Algernon once again scanned the distant shore, eagerly, hopefully, miserably. But the small pebble-strewn beach was as deserted as the sloop, as the rocks and headlands, as the whole dreary, monotonous, interminable sea

The vacuum of despair settled on Algernon and he stood a moment with white.

"Ship ahoy!" Algernon turned, knees shaking with the sudden shock of hearing that gay irresponsible girlish contralto hailing him from the farther side of the sloop. Motionless with the sudden rush of relief, he stared over the roof of the tiny cabin sternly, angrily, in the rush of returning "I saw you coming," said she, smiling at him through her wet hair, his hands on her shoulders, "so I slipped over the edge and hung to the anchor chain to fool you."

But Aigernon did not smile. He stared grimly a moment, then turned and sat down on the roof of the cabin, drawing up his knees and clasping them with his arms, his back to the culprit.

"Your joke," said he gravely, "was a complete success."

She looked at him in surprise, hesitative where he had left her, hands raised to

"I didn't mean to make you angry," said she, drawing nearer.

"Oh, no," said Algernon, not looking around at where she stood in wet and graceful penitence behind him. "You didn't make me angry. It filled me with a wild joy. I thought you had been drowned, that's all. Quite a pleasure, really enjoyable. Another joke like that will take twenty years from my life."

Her eyes danced, but her voice was grave and remorseful. "Please forgive me."

me."
"I shall forgive you," returned Algernon, coldly, sternly, "but you are never to do it again."
"Indeed I won't."

"And you are never to go in swimming here alone until I come." "I have swum every summer all my life," said she mildly.
"I cannot help that," said Algernon. "I didn't know it or it would never have

"Let us go back," sald Algernon, deciding to change the subject. "It is late."

"But we have not swum at all," protested the girl.

She glanced at his solemn face, still a bit pale, and followed him meekly to the edge of the deck, diving when he motioned for her to do so, and waiting for him before striking out to the beach.

Neither spoke as they swam to shore.

In silence Algernon draped himself in his blanket and the girl drew on her slippers and cloak. She glanced at him now and then, amused and repentant, but his face discouraged conversation, and with "Remember," said Algernon sternly, as they came to the parting of the ways,

"I shall wait," said she mildly. "Good-

About ten she called him up on the telephone and ordered one of the cars brought around at once. Her voice had the well-bred coolness of a great lady to her inferior, and Algernon chuckled as he hung up the receiver.
"Molly puts mamma all to the bad," he thought, "when it comes to the real thing. The trouble with mamma is that she has had servants so long she has grown into the habit of speaking to them as if they were human."

"I am going to learn to drive a car." Molly stood on the top step of the terrace, pulling on her gloves as the car rolled up. She nodded with gay determination and smiled down at Algernon. The fog had gone and the sun shone with undiminished lustre on the sweep of the lawn, the huge gray house and the girlish figure standing on the stone steps of the ivy-covered terrace. The bees buzzed incessantly, and a little breeze, laden with the scent of the sea, wandered by secreely stirring the veil around the scarcely stirring the veil around the girl's dainty hat She fastened the button of her glove and then glanced at Algernon and laughed, for no reason but that the day was fair, she was young and life was

FERGUS RESIDENT COMMITS SUICIDE

[Special to The Advertiser.] FERGUS, May 11.—Douglas McGregor, one of the best known residents of Ferhe stared over the roof of the tiny cabin at Molly, clinging with one wet shapely arm over the brass railing that ran the length of the deck. Slowly the misery of the moment before seemed to lift, his heart began to beat again, and the blood returned to his white face, while his clenched hands relaxed and his knees seemed to give from under him. He walked over to her coldly and grimly drew her on deck.

"Where have you been?" he demanded on deck.
