GREAT BRITAIN AND

IT'S TITLE PEST.

After reading of the discussion which has been taking place in the British House of Lords rest, ecting titles one is more than ever inclined to agree with the request of the Canadian House of Commons some years ago, to the effect that no more titles be given to Canadians. The war and its aftermath has had an evil effect upon this title business and goodness wanty. its aftermath has had an evil effect women to this title business and goodness knows it was bad enough in pre-war days. For every little service, no matter how trivial, titles of great and small degree have been spread broadcast in the Old Country. It has got so that it takes all of one's time to dodge them. Advertise yourself sufficiently as the buyer of a large amount of war loan, and bang comes a knighthood or a baronetcy. Writing a goodly amount of patriotic

But worse than all this is the fact that titles are purchaseable with hard cash. Of course, there is this to be said for the cash down principle, it indicates that the buyer of the bauble has some capacity, else he would not have accumulated the money, while a lot of people in England who have titles have neither capacity nor anything else that commends them. That there have not titles have neither capacity nor anything else that commends them. That he came from a tribe of Eskimo and Larged both in the British House of Larged both in the British House of now that way inclined, so don't think mouth that way inclined, so don't think case of an easy method of augmenting party funds. In the present discussion in the Lords the name of Sir James Robinson of South Africa who beat. He came frome plants to have been handed a peerage, for what goodness knows, came prominently to the force. It developed that General Smuts, who really deserve a title, but probably would not accept one under present conditions, was obliged to tell the South Africa who person into the peerage. Whereupon the fift was not have been handed a peerage, for what goodness knows, came prominently to the force.
