The Cyclostyle Duplicating Apparatus.

(Fig. 1.)

Among the evidences of progress and improvement in time and labour-saving devices brought out during the life time of the present generation, none are more remarkable than the inventions for duplicating the handwriting. Formerly if a circular letter or a notice of any kind, or an examination paper, or a price list, was needed, it was imperative to go to a printer, or, if we but wanted a few, to write them out singly till we obtained the number required. This was a sacrifice of time—time is money—and in these days, not to be wasted; necessity is the mother of invention. A want was felt, especially among our literary and commercial men, for some apparatus to multiply from one writing a number of duplicates. First appeared the Papyrograph, a useful machine, with great care and skill; next came Edison's Electric Pen, but as a battery was required, and an electric current to be maintained, the rarely used it; the expense of this machine was a serious consideration. Then followed the Printogram, and the Typograph, the former of which could only duplicate in coloured inks containing aniline dyes, and became very pale and illegible after the first two or three copies and the washing and cleaning necessary every time using was intolerable. The Typograph requires the continual shifting and resetting of the paper every two lines when writing, and the production is jagged and indistinct. The Cyclostyle has none of these objectionable features; it is the latest and best invention for duplicating; it consists of a zinc plate set on a bed, the plate being surrounded by a frame which can be securely fastened to it. The writing is done with a pen, at the end of which is a small wheel. The wheel is surrounded with iridium points, and with this pen so constructed, one can write with as much ease as with the ordinary gold or steel pen, while the writing preserves the characteristics of the user's ordinary penmanship. The operation of the machine is simple, cleanly and effective; any boy can use it. A sheet of the prepared paper is tightly stretched on the frame over the plate, as shown in Fig. 1; and upon it write (see Fig. 2) as upon any other piece of paper. The points on the wheel of the pen puncture the paper, and make a stencil which is then ready to print from. Laying a sheet of paper upon the zinc plate and under the stencil, a small roller covered with ink is passed over the stencil, as in Fig. 3, and the ink, passing through the perforations in the prepared paper, gives a printed copy, as shown in Fig. 4. A clean sheet is laid upon the plate, and one stroke of the roller is sufficient to produce one good copy. The process is quick, thorough, permanent, and adapted to all kinds of work, either music, drawing, or writing. It is in indelible black ink, and all copies are of the same intensity—the one thousandth copy is as good as the first. Since its introduction into this country some time ago, this machine supplanted all prior inventions, and it does better work in a quarter of the time and at half the expense of any other process. Most of our railroad offices, banks, insurance companies, government offices have it, the professional and mercantile firms are using it, and, as its merits and simplicity become known, no office will be considered complete without it. The company invite correspondence, and will be pleased to send samples of work of either writing, drawing or music done on the machine. To mercantile firms, barristers, and others, who have a typewriter in use, the machine is still more valuable, as it is made available for taking typewritten copies from one operation of the typewriter, five hundred copies may be taken, all of the same intensity.
